FOREWORD.

§ 1 Discovery and Editing.

The Tattvasaṅgraha of S'ântarakṣita with the commentary or Pañjikâ of Kamalaśîla, now presented to the public for the first time in the original Sanskrit, is undoubtedly one of the most important works to be published in the Gaekwad's Oriental Series. The Tattvasaṅgraha may be called a work on logic: it undertakes to refute all the philosophical systems and conceptions then current in India from the standpoint of a Mahâyâna Buddhist with the help of the logic of pure reason. The wide variety of systems refuted and the authorities quoted make the publication of the work a most important contribution to the history of Sanskrit literature.

The original text of Tattvasaṅgraha was discovered by that indefatigable searcher of MSS, Dr. G. Buhler, who came across it during his explorations of the Bṛhat Jñâna Koṣa in the temple of Pârśvanâtha at Jaisalmer in 1873. The work comprised a MS consisting of 183 palm leaves (written in characters of the 12th or 13th century) which bore on the outside corner the title Kamalas'îlatarka. Dr. Buhler published an account of the work in the Journal of the Buddhist Text Society,[1] immediately after an article on the Indian Pandits in Tibet[2] was published by Rai Sarat Chandra Das Bahadur, C. I. E., who was perhaps the first Indian in modern times to learn Tibetan and to acquaint himself intimately with the Tibetan literature. In his article Mr. Das drew the attention of scholars to several Indian Pandits who were responsible for overhauling and reforming the Buddhism of Tibet, notably S'ântarakṣita, Kamalaśîla and Dîpaṅkara S'rî-jñâna. The first two Pandits visited Tibet in the eighth century and the third in the eleventh century. Dr. Buhler, however, missed the name of the work and called it Tarkasaṅgraha, though he correctly cited the beginning. It was first pointed out by Mahamahopadhyaya Dr. Satis Chandra Vidyabhushana that the name of the work is not Tarkasaṅgraha but Tattvasaṅgraha,[1] and he cited its Tibetan translation as his authority. But the learned Doctor considered this small pothi of 183 leaves to comprise both the text and the voluminous commentary of Kamalas'îla, though nowhere could he find a trace of the commentary except the doubtful title on the outer cover of the MS namely Kamalas'îlatarka.[2] The description given in our Catalogue of MSS in the Jaisalmer Bhandars, published as No. XXI in the Gaekwad' Oriental Series,[3] shows that this particular MS consisted of 185 palm leaves, and it did not even contain the full text, much less the commentary, which was three times as large as the actual text. Dr. Satis Chandra[4] attributes the credit of discovering the commentary to Dr. Buhler, but this assertion of his has no foundation. Sridhar R. Bhandarkar in his Report of a Second Tour in search of Sanskrit MSS made in Rajputana and Central India,[5] published in 1907, mentioned indeed a Tattvasaṅgrahapañjikâ by Kamalaśîla, but the way in which he described the MS does not convey any definite idea, and it is evident that he was entirely ignorant of the value of the MS in question. The same was the case with Manilal Nabhubhai Dvivedi, who in his Catalogue of MSS in the Pattan Bhandars in Gujarati mentioned[6] the names of two books "Kamalas'îla" and "Kamalas'îlavṛtti" but failed to ascertain their correct titles and was unaware of the importance of the works.

The discovery of the commentary of Kamalaśîla is the result of the search instituted by His Highness Maharaja Sir Sayaji Rao Gaekwad, who deputed the late Mr. C. D. Dalal, a trained librarian and a learned scholar, to inspect and examine the famous Jain Bhandars in Gujarat and Rajputana. Mr. Dalal, after painstaking labours, discovered a number of important and unique MSS at Jaisalmer, and among these were the text and the commentary of Tattvasaṅgraha.[1] He at once realised the importance of the work, but could neither secure the MSS nor get copies, for, as is widely known on this side, it is easier to bring God down from heaven than to get a MS from the Jain Bhandars of Pattan and Jaisalmer, but the undaunted searcher of MSS was not disheartened. The clue thrown out by Pandit Dvivedi had put him on the right track, and when he found an opportunity of examining the Bhandars of Pattan he succeeded in running his quarry to earth in the Wâḍi Pârśvanâtha Bhandar in that ancient city. Moreover, by his personal influence he secured a loan of the manuscripts with the object of publishing the work in the Gaekwad's Oriental Series.

We take this opportunity of recording our grateful thanks to the keepers of the Wâdi Pârśvanâtha Bhandar, who have shown great courtesy and consideration in permitting the Central Library authorities to retain their valuable manuscripts for the last six years.

The work of editing was entrusted to our esteemed editor, Pandit Embar Krishnamacharya of Vadtal. He is a deeply learned S'âstrî of the old school, well acquainted with all the tenets of the leading philosophical schools in India. That he has made a thorough study of Buddhist Philosophy, Logic and Religion will be evident from the excellent manner in which he has edited the text, restored readings from almost illegible MSS, and prepared elaborate lists of quotations and their identifications with a full summary of contents in the Kârikâ form. His Sanskrit Introduction is scholarly and informing and written in a judicious spirit. He has in short spared no pains in discharging his onerous task.

§ 2. S'ântarakṣita's personal History.

S'ântarakṣita was one of the greatest scholars India had ever produced, though she unfortunately recorded no personal incidents of his life. All that we know of his personal history, comes from Tibetan sources. Unlike other great scholiasts of Buddhism he was unknown in China, as it does not appear from Nanjio that his works were ever translated into Chinese, or that S'ântarakṣita was in any way connected with that country. In Tibet our author was well-known under the three names, S'ântarakṣita, S'ântirakṣita and Âcârya Bodhisattva. The details of his life was first given by Rai Bahadur Sarat Chandra Das in his article entitled, Indian Pandits in Tibet published in the first part of the Journal of the Buddhist Text Society as compiled from Bu-ston's Chos hbyuñ.[1] As this is the only account of S'ântarakṣita left to us, we do not hesitate to reproduce the article in extenso, even though it abounds in numerous matters which may appear to a student of history as legendary or fanciful:—

> The king (Thi-sron-deu-tsan of Tibet) sent Yeses *d*vañ with three companions namely Lañ groñ *s*na-ra, *G*ñer *s*tag *b*tsan stoñ *g*zigs and *S*prañ *r*gya-ra legs *g*zigs to bring Âcârya Bodhisattva from Nepal. They met the Âcârya in Manyul. Leaving Lañ groñ *s*na-ra with the Âcârya they returned to the capital to pay homage to the king and to know if he continued to favour Buddhism. The Shañ *b*lon, (the minister who opposed the Buddhism) said, whether it would be propor to permit the use of evil charms of the Southern country of Nepal is a matter which should be carefully examined. So saying he sent Sañ *s'i*s, Sen goñ lha luñ *g*zigs and *M*chim me-lan to Manyul for the purpose of ascertaining the usefulness of the cult of the Buddhists. Being unacquainted with the Indian language the messengers employed Ananta, the K'shmirian Pandit, to interpret it. On their reporting in favour of the Âcârya he was brought to the palace of the King together with Ananta or his interpreter. During his residence at *R*luñ tshubs for four months the Âcârya expounded the doctrine of Das'a Kus'ala (the ten virtues), the eighteen regions and the twelve causal concatenations. The gods and demigods of Tibet grew indignant at this intrusion of Buddhism in their country, caused the rivers to overflow the higher plains, the thunder-bolt to fall on *D*marpo*h*iri (the red hill of Lhasa and on which Potala was latterly built) and diseases and murrain to rage in the country. These calamities and ominous visitations turned the minds of the people away from Buddhism which henceforth was looked upon as inauspicious. Accordingly they sent back Âcârya Bodhisattva to Nepal. A short time after this *s*Ba *gsal s*nañ proceeded to China to study Buddhism. About the time that he left Tibet a certain Hoshang (Chinese Buddhist monk) told (the Emperor) that after six months and six days there would arrive at the capital of China a re-embodiment of the venerable Bodhisattva As'vaghoṣa. He made an image saying that the expected incarnate visitor would be like it in appearance. When *s*Ba *gsal s*nañ, the incarnate As'vaghoṣa arrived the Emperor being pleased with the truth of the prediction bestowed honour on the Hoshang as a mark of his appreciation and took religious instructions from him. The Emperor made rich presents to *s*Ba *gsal s*nañ, when he started back for Tibet. During his absence the king had sent an escort of 30 officers headed by Sañ s'ïs to bring back Âcârya (Bodhisattva) from Nepal. But this time he declined to return to Tibet. On the return of *s*Ba *gsal s*nañ from China the king requested him to go to Nepal to fetch the Indian Âcârya. Accordingly he proceeded to Nepal and brought back Âcârya Bodhisattva to Tibet. Again the gods and demigods began to show their hostile feelings towards Buddhism. The Indian Pandit represented to the king that unless they (the demigods and genii) were subdued by mystic charms it would be impossible for him to do Buddhist religious work in Tibet, for they would exert themselves to endanger the king's life. Accordingly he advised the monarch to send for Âcârya Padma Sambhava, who was possessed of extraordinary occult powers and mystic resources. The king gave out to the public that he was directed in a dream by the gods to send for Padma Sambhava. He sent *s*Ba *s*nañ, rJe *gsal s*nañ and Señ goñ lha luñ with five companions to bring the sage of Udyâna to Tibet. Padma Sambhava anticipating by dint of fore-knowledge, that his services would be valued in the country of Himavat had already reached Guñthañ in Manyul when the king's messenger met him there. Escorted by them he proceeded to Tibet. On the way he suppressed many evil spirits and demigods by means of mystic charms. On their agreeing under solemn compact to be friendly to Buddhism he set them free. Arriving at Has-puri he interviewed the king who received him with great veneration. Then proceeding to the upland of Mal*g*ro he summoned all the gods and demigods of Tibet to appear before him and compelled them to enter under oath into a covenant for defending Buddhism. At the request of the king he selected a site for building the monastery of Sam-ye. Âcârya Bodhisattva examined the hidden features of the site and cleared it of its inauspicious omens and malignant residents, such as nâga demigods, hobgoblins, &c. Under the direction of these eminent Buddhist Pandits the king built the monastery of Sam-ye upon the con-secrataed spot, after the model of the famous monastery of Odantapuri of Magadha. It contained twelve temples called the Rirab gliñ and two principal Mousolia called Ni-da (the sun and the moon) surrounded by an outer wall. The foundation of the grand monastery of Sam-ye was laid in the year called (Memo-yos-bu) she fire-hare. First of all the temple of Ârya Pâla was built. The images of the deities and saints of Buddhism were constructed at this time after the form and appearance of the Tibetans. The monastery was completed in the year called (Sa-mo yos) she earth-hare. Âcârya Bodhisattva and Padma Sambhava consecrated it and worked in it successfully for the diffusion of Buddhism during a period of thirteen years. In the year called sheep they invited twelve Bhikshus (monks) belonging to the Sarvâstivâdin school from Magadha. With a view to ascertain if the Tibetans would make good monks, seven young men were, for the first time, admitted as novices in the monastery. These were called (sad-mi mi bdun) the seven picked monks. * * * * * * * * * * *

In this manner Buddhism was greatly diffused in Tibet under the auspices of the king the illustrious Thi sroñ deu tsan. In the year called dragon, Bandé DPal brtsegs, Bandé Nâgendra and others were engaged in translating the sacred Buddhist scriptures in Tibetan, and in arranging them in chapters, sections, stanzas, etc. * * * They also published the list of contents of those works. At this time Âcârya Bodhisattva remarked in prophetic words that although the religion of the Tîrthikas will not be introduced in Tibet, yet there will arise two divisions in the Buddhist church, which would give rise to religious controversies. At that time you will be compelled to call my disciple named Kamalas'îla from India to take part in the discussion. He will put an end to all kind of doubts by bringing over victory to the side of real Dharma. Shortly after this he died from an accident. According to some writers he died of a serious hurt which he had received probably from a kick of a pony.

S'ântarakṣita, according to Mr. Das., was a native of Gaur and the high priest of Nâlandâ, who went to Tibet in the first half of the 8th century, established the great monastery of Samye and invited Padmasambhava to come to Tibet.[1] According to another Tibetan authority[2] mentioned by Dr. Vidyabhushana,[3] S'ântarakṣita was born in the Royal family of Zâ-hôr, a name which he failed to identify. Waddell in his Lamaism[1] identified Zâ-hôr with Lahore but his query after the word indicates that the identification was uncertain. Zâ-hôr, which must be situated in Bengal or more properly Gauḍa Bâṅgâlâ, may however be discovered in the Pargana of Vikrampur (Dacca District) which was one of the greatest seats of Buddhism in Bengal in mediaeval times, and which produced a great Buddhist reformer in Tibet in the person of Dîpaṅkara S'rîjñâna or Atisa. The small village of Sâbhâr in this Pargana bears a name which is a regular phonetic equivalent of Zâ-hôr in Tibetan, and seems to be the place where S'ântarakṣita was born. Ruins of old palaces are still to be met with in this little village, and decorated bricks of charming workmanship from this place have found a resting place in many a museum in Bengal. The large number of Tântric Buddhist images discovered round about the place also lends support to this identification.

Further details about S'ântarakṣita come from another Tibetan source in connection with the legendary origin of Padmasambhava.[2] The story states that when he was driven out by the people of Uḍḍiyâna[3] in spite of the attempts of the ruling king to save him, he went eastwards to Zâ-hôr, and married a sister of S'ântarakṣita who was much interested in him and brought him to Tibet in order to drive out the mischievous spirits of Tibet, and to assist him in his Buddhist propaganda work in that country.[4] Now this little story links up S'ântarakṣita with an interesting series of scholars whose dates may be fixed fairly accurately.

From the reliable dates obtained from Tibetan sources we learn that S'ântarakṣita erected the monastery of Sam-ye, the first regular monastery in Tibet modelled after the Odantapuri Vihâra in Maghadha, in the year 749 A. D.,[1] that he remained there thirteen years and subsequently died in 762 A. D. Waddell states that Guru Padmasambhava was called to Tibet in the years 747 A. D. It is quite likely therefore that S'ântarakṣita paid his first visit to Tibet some five years earlier, or in the year 743 A. D. Guru Padmasambhava, being the brother-in-law of S'ântarakṣita, must have been his contemporary, and if we assume that Padmasambhava went to Tibet at the age of 30, his date of birth falls somewhere in 717 A. D. Now S'ântarakṣita was born in the reign of Gopâla,[2] the first king of the Pâla Dynasty of Bengal who reigned up to 705 A. D. The latest date of his birth falls therefore in 705 A. D. which will award 57 years' span of life to S'ântarakṣita.

The date of Padmasambhava's birth leads us to another chain of scholars. The legendary origin of Padmasambhava, as given by Waddell[3] is stated below. The story goes that in olden age there lived a blind king named Indrabhûti (also oBodhi) in Uḍḍiyâna in India, who suffered two calamities: he lost his son and his kingdom was afflicted by a severe famine. Touched by the fervent prayers of the people Amitâbha Buddha of Boundless Light restored sight to the monarch and incarnated himself as a boy. King Indrabhûti miraculously regained his sight and saw in a lake nearby lying on a lotus a lovely boy who was brought to the palace.

As the lad grew up he became prone to meditation and expressed his desire to be a recluse. The guardian persistently refused to grant his desire whereupon the boy killed some of Indrabhûti's subjects who had been inimical to Buddhism in their previous births, and this resulted in his being driven out of the kingdom. The miraculous appearance of Padmasambhava on a lotus cannot be anything else than an example of popular etymology, because padma means 'lotus' and sambhava means 'birth'. But from the story it appears evident that Padmasambhava was the second son of a Buddhist king, Indrabhûti by name, who reigned over the kingdom of Uḍḍiyâna or Orissa.[1]

This Indrabhûti is quite a familiar Buddhist name, for we have discovered a work of Indrabhûti which styles itself Uḍḍiyânavinirgata, "coming out of Uḍḍiyâna." Indrabhûti seems to have been a voluminous writer of Tantra, and the Tangyur catalogue in several instances designates him as king of Uḍḍiyâna.[2] Unfortunately for us no works of Indrabhûti are now extant in the original Sanskrit except the one mentioned above, Jñânasiddhi[3] by name, which is a work of pure Vajrayâna, and Mahâsukhavâda, which formulates the doctrine that emancipation can be obtained only through the medium of the knowledge of the Tathâgatas or the five Dhyâni Buddhas—a truth which cannot be realized without the friendly offices of the Guru. The famous Tibetan scholar Mr. Johan van Manen has pointed out to us in a letter the importance of this work in the history of Buddhist literature. In the Tangyur Catalogue compiled by Cordier, the names of nine scholars are mentioned, each of whom was the guru to his successor, namely, Padmavajra, Anaṅgavajra, Indrabhûti, Bhagavatî Lakṣmî, Lîlâvajra, Dârikapâda, Sahajayoginî Cintâ and Ḍombî Heruka. If we take about 12 years between each name we get the history of a succession of scholars for about 84 years.

In the year 717 A. D. when the second son Padmasambhava was born to Indrabhûti, he was at least 30 years old, which fixes

1. Uḍḍiyâna is identified with Udyâna by some scholars. According to Sylvain Levi it is in Kashgarh. But we are not prepared to believe that a Bengalee king will marry his daughter to a distant Kashgarhian. For further particulars, see Indian Buddhist Iconography, intro. p. XXVII.

us down to A. D. 687 or earlier as the birth-date of Indrabhûti. His Guru Anaṅgavajra must have flourished in 705 and the latter's Guru in 693 A. D. The whole chronological chain may therefore be stated as follows:—

§ 3. Kamalas'îla's personal history.

Kamalaśîla's personal history likewise comes from the same Tibetan source as that of his Guru S'ântarakṣita. The article entitled Indian Pandits in Tibet[1] by Sarat Chandra Das, already referred to, contains the only information we may hope to obtain from Tibetan sources. The details about his activities in Tibet are given in the following words by Sarat Chandra Das :—

"Accordingly he sent messengers to Magadha to bring Âcârya Kamalas'îla. The Hoshang became very much concerned at this attempt of the king to encourage the Indian School. He began to teach the Dharma by explaining the larger yum, Prajñâ Pâramitâ and other abstruse works in his peculiar manner. He prohibited the use of the S'âstras and the practice of the Buddhist Cult taught to them. To lie down perfectly inactive was explained by him as the highest practice of religion. Dhyâna (meditation) was nothing but a state of passive inactivity, and the avoidence of discussion on religion was to be considered as the best kind of Dhyâna, when this was accomplished by one's own intelligence. The basis of the theory was not to be found in the Buddhist Scriptures. It existed only in his imagination. The Eighty Sûtrântas delivered by the BUDDHA which formed the foundation of Buddhism were rejected by him when they were found to disagree with his strange ideas, as useless and unauthoritative. At this juncture Yes'es dvañ-po communicated to him what the views of the Indian philosopher Kamalas'îla were. The king was very much delighted with his explanations and complimented him by repeating:—You are my Âcârya, &c. * * *

When Kamalas'îla arrived, the discussion between the two schools was resumed. The king presided at the assembly as the Chief Umpire, taking his seat at the middle of the hall. The Hoshang headed eight rows of seats which were allotted to his followers, and the Indian Âcârya sat at the top of the left row which were filled up by the Tsen-min-pa.

The King placed a garland in the hands of each of the disputants, and commanded that whoever would suffer a defeat in the discussion should present his garland to the winner, and leave the country for ever,

First of all the Hoshang said—When virtuous or sinful acts are performed the result is either translation to heaven or damnation in hell. So in none of these conditions could the Sattva be liberated from worldly existence. Both were therefore obstructions to his attaining to Buddhahood, i. e., Nirvâṇa. For instance, he continued, the sky becomes equally obscured by a white or dark cloud. Wherefore one should not think on any subject at all. If the mind remains absolutely free from thought, i. e. inactive, then emancipation from Bhâva (worldly existence) is possible and not otherwise. Want of Vikalpanâ (absence of thoughtfulness i. e. intellectual activity in body or in speech) is equivalent to the state of Nirâlamba, i. e. the total isolation or abstraction of the mind.

Kamalas'îla replied—To say (that it is possible) to be free from thought, (in other words) to be in a state of absolute mental inactivity, constitutes actual rejection of Pratyavekṣaṇâ Prajñâ, knowledge derived from critical examination (of things and phenomena). The root (basis) of Samyak Jñâna (perfect wisdom) is indeed Pratyavekṣaṇâ Prajñâ. Therefore the abandonment of it is tantamount to rejecting the Lokavigata Prajñâ, i. e. wisdom that transcends the faculties of man and god. Without the Pratyavekṣaṇâ Prajñâ how can the Yogî (the meditative devotee) find himself in the state of Avikalpanâ, i. e. the state of absolute abstraction? If there be absolute inactivity of mind so as to cause unconsciousness, i. e., the loss of the power of cognition of all external or internal phenomena and in that to be devoid of knowledge, the mind would be contending against inactivity itself. If I think that I must not remember any Dharma that very thought belies the determination and brings all remembrance with greater force. If again the mind be thrown into a state of unconsciousness, i. e., his functions be paralysed, it may be freed from Vikalpanâ temporarily, i. e, for a time it may remain in that state. Without Samyak Pratyavekṣaṇâ there are no means of attaining to the state in which the mind is free from Vikalpanâ. If only the working of the faculty of the memory is suspended, in the absence of Samyak Pratyavekṣaṇâ you cannot realize that all things and phenomena (Sarvadharma) are in their nature void and their apparent state impermanent, and unless that is acquired, the obfuscating process that is constantly at work will not be removed. Therefore by Samyak Prajñâ the false (delusive) notions should be thrown out, and while remembering everything, there cannot be forgetting all things (Sarvadharma) which is evidently a contradiction. The working of the memory and at the same time absolute inactivity of the mind cannot exist together. Because the former is activity, and the latter state its negation which is to be acquired (according to the Hoshang) cannot be co-existent. How can the Pûrvasthâna Anusmarana i. e., the remembrance of one's place and condition of former existence be obliterated? Therefore the Yogî who thinks by discrimination acquires Samayak Prajñâ and maditating on the inner and outer phenomena (Sarvadharma) in reference to the three times, looses the Vikalpanâ (diversity of thought) and thereby becomes free from erroneous notions and conceptions. In this manner being well versed in the Upâya (means) and Jñâna (knowledge) one should be free from darkness and thereby acquire the state of Sambodhi Dharma—Supreme enlightenment.

It appears from the above that Kamalaśîla was a direct disciple and a junior contemporary of S'ântarakṣita. He went to Tibet at the invitation of the Tibetan king *T*hi *s*ron *d*eu *t*san (A. D. 728-864); he reached Tibet after the death of S'ântarakṣita, which took place in the year 762 A. D; held a discussion with the Chinese Monk Mahâyâna Hoshang during the last two years of the reign of the Tibetan king *T*hi *S*ron *d*eu *t*san and was instrumental in driving his rival out of Tibet. Kamalaśîla must have been S'ântarakṣita's disciple at Nalanda before the latter paid his first visit to Tibet in the year 743 A. D. and in his opinion Kamalaśîla had by that time attained sufficient scholarship to prove a match for the Mahâyâna Hoshang. S. C. Das[1] really believes that S'ântarakṣita was unable to defeat the Chinese Hoshang, and hence Kamalaśîla was sent for. Whatever the facts may be we can take it for granted that Kamalaśîla before his Guru's first visit to Tibet had attained fame as a scholar and a debator, and we will not be far from the truth if we assume that Kamalaśîla at that time (i. e. 743 A. D.) was at least 30 years old; this assumption will fix the approximate date of his birth at 713 A. D. His native place however still remains unknown. Kamalas'îla besides his works on Nyâya, has, like his preceptor, written a number of works on Tantra, and it is reported that he was a professor of Tantra at Nalanda[1]. Unfortunately none of these works is preserved in the original Sanskrit though all are extant in Tibetan translations. Besides the Tattvasaṅgraha-Pañjikâ he wrote the following works among others:—

1. Âryasaptas'atika-Prajñâpâramitâṭîkâ.
2. Âryavajracchedikâ-Prajñâpâramitâṭîkâ.
3. Prajñâpâramitâhṛdayanâmaṭîkâ.
4. Nyâyabindu purvapakṣe samkṣipta.
5. Ḍâkinîvajraguhyagîti nâma marmopades'a;

and translated into Tibetan—

6. Mahâmudropades'a Vajraguhyagîti.[2]

The voluminous commentary of Kamalas'îla in the present work is a monument of his great learning and scholarship. He elaborates the terse and very difficult Kârikâs of his Guru; where the Guru does not mention the names of authors, but states only their opinions, Kamalas'îla supplies the authors' names, giving extensive quotations from their works. In some cases where S'ântarakṣita considers further refutation of the opponent's theory to be unnecessary Kamalas'îla himself takes up the cudgels and shows his profound learning by carrying the discussion still further, anticipating the most minutest objections on the part of his opponent, and vanquishing him thoroughly and completely. But all through his commentary and discussions he retains his dignity never condescending to redicule his opponent. As a whole we miss in his writings that peculiar charm of style and diction which characterizes the work of his Guru S'ântarakṣita.

§ 4. S'ântarakṣita as an author.

Dr. Vidyabhushana in his monumental History of Indian Logic,[1] records another work of S'ântarkṣita, entitled, Vâda-Nyâya-Vipañcitârtha which is an elaborate commentary on the Vâda-Nyâya of Dharmakîrti. The Sanskrit original is lost, but a translation exists in Tibetan which was translated by the Indian Pandit Kumâra S'rî Bhadra in the monastery of Samye. His Tattvasaṅgraha was translated into Tibetan by the Kashmirian Pandit Guṇâkara S'rî Bhadra, who was a contemporary of the famous Kashmir king Lalitâditya (A. D. 693-729)[2]. Besides this we find mention of several more works of S'ântarakṣita, translated into Tibetan in the Tibetan Tangyur[3] under the names of S'ântarakṣita, S'ântirakṣita and Âcârya Bodhisattva. Among others he wrote the following works:—

1. Âcârya Bodhisattva.

    1. Vajravidâraṇînâmadhâraṇîṭîkâ.
    2. Sarvatathâgata-pûrva-praṇidhâna-vis'eṣa-vistara-sûtrântopades'a.

We have been so fortunate as to discover another Sanskrit Tântric work of S'ântarakṣita, not mentioned in the Tibetan Tangyur. It is entitled Tattvasiddhi and formulates the doctrine of Mahâsukhavâda, a development of the Vijñânavâda. The colophon at the end of the work ascribes its authorship to S'ântarakṣita, and gives him the epithet of अशेषपरसिद्धान्तसागरपार 'one who has crossed the ocean of all the manifold doctrines formulated by others'. These two facts, together with the style of writing, point unmistakeably to S'ântarakṣita's authorship. A copy of this MS was first discovered by us in a bundle of works in the possession of Mm. Haraprasad Shastri. The whole bundle was subsequently copied on the Photostat machine for the Central Library, Baroda[1]. Another copy of the MS is in the possession of Pandit Siddhiharsa Vajrâcâryya of Nepal. This new work, has not been mentioned in the Nepal catalogues, nor, in the catalogues of any library to which Nepal MSS have migrated, such as, Cambridge University or the Asiatic Society of Bengal. The new MS of Tattvasiddhi of S'ântarakṣita reveals certain facts which have a direct bearing on the creed of the author, and the history of the Buddhist literature during the period. The Tattvasiddhi in the first place is an elaborate defence of Vajrayâna and begins with a Namaskâra[2] to Vajrayâna (adamantine path) which is of the nature of Mahâsukha or Great Happiness or eternal bliss. In several places the work lays stress on the Vijñânavâda,[3] and it quotes extensively from several earlier works. Two quotations have got special value amongst them, viz., one from S'ântideva's Bodhicaryâvatâra,[4] and another from his own work Tattvasaṅgraha.[1] It shows therefore that his Tattvasaṅgraha was composed before the Tântric work was written, and probably before the author paid his first visit to Tibet. It further shows that our author was a Vijñânavâdin, or more correctly a Vajrayânist, as Mahâsukhavâda is declared to be possible only when the momentary Vijñâna is held to be extant after the Nirvâṇa has been attained, and is considered as eternal. It is therefore a direct repudiation of the theory held in certain quarters that our author was of the Svatantra Mâdhyamika sect, in which, however, there is no place of Vijñâna when the stage of Nirvâṇa is reached. Some scholars[2] also hold that S'ântarakṣita belonged to the Svatantra Yogâcâra school, and if this corresponds to what is known as Vajrayâna the theory may be taken as correct. But he cannot be taken as the founder of that school as we know of at least two earlier authors, Indrabhûti and his Guru Anaṅga-vajra, both of whom mention the Mahâsukhavâda and describe it fully in their works, Jñânasiddhi and Prajñopâyavinis'cayasiddhi[3] In some quarters it is held that the Svatantra school does not seem to differ very materially from the Prâsaṅgika school. The difference seems to lie in the fact that while the Prâsaṅgika school does not undertake to refute rival systems or philosophical doctrines, but goes on to establish its own thesis, anticipating objections as occasions arise (prasaṅga). The Svatantra school, on the contrary, undertakes to refute all such systems and philosophical notions, and establishes its own thesis in the teeth of opposition. If such be the nature of the difference between the Prâsaṅgika and Svatantra schools we can have no hesitation in calling S'ântarkṣita as a Svatantra Yogâcâra.

The Tattvasiddhi now settles definitely the date of S'ântideva. There has been a great difficulty in fixing the date of this author who composed the three works, Sûtrasamuccaya, Sikṣâsamuccaya and Bodhicaryâvatâra.[1] But the evidence of Tattvasiddhi where S'ântarakṣita quotes a full s'loka from the Bodhicaryâvatâra once for all settles the question. It proves that S'ântideva flourished in a period between the departure of I—Tsing from India in 695 and before S'ântarakṣita's first visit to Tibet in A. D. 743.[2] § 5 S'ântarakṣita's Style.

That S'ântarakṣita was an author of phenomenal learning is evident from every line of his writing. In almost every stanza he arranges the words in such a way that the minor term, major term, middle term and the example, invariably follow one after another is logical sequence. While stating the theories of his opponent he at once finds out from the amazing complications of the Indian philosophical literature the very essential grounds on which his theories are based, and states them one after another till the whole edifice is firmly established with all the fortifications of reasons and arguments. Thereafter he cunningly detects the broad and minute defects in the opponent's arguments and proceeds to attack the fort with the characteristic ability of an experienced tactician. He advances his arguments slowly and confidently, but with extraordinary caution, and with examples considered valid by both parties, anticipating objections which may be put forward by his antagonist at every step. These objections he nullifies as occasions arise, and ultimately smashes each and every argument on which the theories of his opponent are based, and drives his adversary to a corner. He then explains to his vanquished opponent what his position is tantamount to, and proves that the only way to escape from this undesirable position is to hold a Buddhist theory or be a Buddhist. On such occasions S'ântarakṣita is as jovial as a child and from his mouth flows examples of the very best kind of humour associated with a refined dignity. His humour is seen very frequently when his opponent is reduced by his arguments to a theory which is also an accepted fact in Buddhism. In cases of this kind he refers his opponent to a party which is directly opposed to a theory of this type.

The genius of S'ântarakṣita will be at once apparent if we consider the fact that, with the obvious object of offering his obeisance to Lord Buddha, the first promulgator of the doctrine of Dependent Origination by means of six tiny stanzas, he lays down the whole foundation of his work, which covers very nearly four thousand verses, and anticipates all the twenty-six examinations on various subjects in the stanzas mentioned, where almost each word suggests a new examination.

One noteworthy fact about S'ântarakṣita's style of writing is that he seldom named the authors whose views he either quoted or explained in stating the position of his antagonists before criticising them. Why he did so is difficult to explain. It was certainly not his motive, as some may be inclined to think, to pass off these quotations as his own composition, because in that case he would not have quoted Kumârila extensively without naming him in all instances. Kumârila must have been very famous in his time, and our author would not have attempted to pass the compositions of the former off as his own. His omission to mention the names of a large number of authors while stating their views and quoting their opinions is due most probably to his over-estimation of the popularity of the respective doctrines stated by him, or because he was conscious that these names will be supplied by his favourite and erudite disciple, Kamalaśîla, in his promised commentary. The way in which Kamalaśîla confidently refers these verses and opinions to their respective originators makes it probable that Kamalaśîla must have taken lessons directly from his Guru, S'ântarakṣita, before he began composing his monumental commentary which comprises no less than fifteen thousand granthas.

In order to understand more clearly the manner in which S'ântarakṣita proceeds to refute the arguments of his opponents we shall take from his work a confutation of the Lokâyatas, a sect of materialist philosophers, which seems to have been very popular in his own day, but of which very little is now known. The following is a free translation of the stanzas in question, and is given in order to follow the chain of reasoning adopted by S'ântarakṣita. The Lokâyata Parîkṣâ comes in after S'ântarakṣita had already refuted the doctrines of Âtman (soul) and the three times, past, present and future.

The Lokâyatas now proceed to say that when there is neither the soul nor anything that continues in the three times, why then, there should be transmigration, seeing that there is nobody or nothing to transmigrate? (1857)

The body, consciousness and the sense organs are momentary, so there is no transmigration, as the doctrine of soul is not accepted by you. (1858)

The mind is merely the product of a combination of the elements, just as some acid eructations or wines are results of chemical combination. The four elements when combined produce the mind (according to some) or manifest the mind (according to others). (1859)

Different combinations of the four Bhûtas are designated by the words, body, sense-organs, etc. Really speaking, there is no other realities than the Bhûtas. (1860)

You maintain that the mind at death passes on to another body; but this cannot be correct, as the minds being in different bodies must be different, just as the minds of a cow and a horse are different, and not related to one another as cause and effect. (1861)

The consciousness in the body, which comes into being and the consciousness in the body which has already perished cannot be related to one another as cause and effect, just as the stream of consciousness is different in different cognitions. (1862)

Even though the mind is endowed with feelings at death, it cannot produce another mind after total annihilation? Is the mind of the emancipated able to produce another mind? (1863)

So consciousness is produced from the body which is endowed with life and vital air. This is the view held by Kambalâśvatara. (1864)

That the fœtus is endowed with consciousness is a theory too bold to be asserted, because how can the sense-organs receive sensations when they are not in existence.? (1865)

Without sensations no consciousness is possible; in an unconscious state also there is no consciousness because the sense-organs do not receive sensations. (1866)

In the unconscious state the consciousness does not exist even as a dormant power, because no power is possible without a recipient. (1867)

You do not accept an Ego as a recipient of consciousness, so when the body perishes where can the consciousness remain? It must perish also. (1868)

You hold that the mind passes on to another body after death. If it is so, then how without seeing that body can we believe that the mind passes on to another body? (1869)

Even if we accept that the mind at death passes on to another body, how can we understand that this particular mind passes on to another body? The consciousness remaining in different bodies of elephants and horses cannot pass into each other's bodies. How can there be one continuous stream of consciousness? (1870)

Therefore you have either to assume the Vaidika theory of Âtman which is eternal and endowed with consciousness, or be an Atheist like us. (1871)

Refutation.

S'ântarakṣita then proceeds to refute the theories of the Lokâyatas.

What are you disproving with regard to the next life? Do you want to refute the chain of moments in consciousness that are connected to one another by the law of causation, or do you assume something different from the stream of consciousness as the next world? (1872)

We hold that the next birth is nothing but a particular condition of the stream of consciousness which is eternal; so this, the previous, and the future births are nothing but particular conditions of this chain of consciousness. (1873)

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

You are satisfied with whatever is perceived by the senses, and you are content to think of distant places as other worlds; similarly, we also consider the other worlds as nothing but different conditions of the chain of conciousness. (1874)

If you want to refute the next world as something else than this condition of the chain of consciousness, then your efforts will be fruitless, because we do not acknowledge a next world of any other kind. (1875)

The Cârvâkas at once raise an objection and say,—the chain of consciousness is not an entity, and a condition that can be predicated only in respect of an entity cannot therefore be proved. How can you predicate a future existence of an entity which is non-existent? (1876)

Our author replies: not so; by the phrase "chain of consciousness" I mean a continuous chain of momentary consciousness. In order to express in a general way I used this particular word in the same way, as by a single word 'forest' all things contained in a forest are expressed. (1877)

Those moments of consciousniss in a chain can be called as entities, though their totality cannot be called as such, in the same way as a chain of lotuses in the sky cannot be called an entity. Why can it not be proved that conciousness is without a beginning or end? (1878)

Our author further attempts to drive his opponents into a corner and gives five alternatives to them to explain the origination of their conception of mind and says:—

Is the mind of yours after birth produced by (1) no cause, or (2) by some eternal cause, or (3) is it inherently eternal and one, or (4) is it the product of the elements only, or (5) of a different chain of consciousness the mind itself being a chain of consciousness? (1879–80)

(1) If at birth the first consciousness comes spontaneously then we should expect to find consciousness in every kind of body such as a dead body or an unconscious body. But such is not the

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

case. As consciousness is found in some bodies and not in all bodies there must be a cause: otherwise, it ought to be seen everywhere. (1881)

(2) The objects, such as, mind, time, directions, God and soul, are regarded as eternal. The first consciousness is not the product of any of these; so this consciousness must also be eternal and must exist always and be without a beginning.

(3) Moreover, the first consciousness cannot be eternal according to your theory, because it does not exist before birth, nor can the first consciousness be one, as we find the cognitions of form, taste, sound, and the like, are different.

(4) From the elements also it is neither produced nor manifested because all the different kinds of cognitions will then be produced simultaneously and not in succession, because you maintain that the elements are non-momentary and do not require the help of assisting conditions. The different kinds of cognitions are not produced all at once, but in succession, so the first consciousness can not be the product of the elements. (1882–85)

If you accept the doctrine of momentariness to obviate this difficulty in that case it goes directly against your theory. (1886)

[Kamalaśîla at this point carries the discussion further and shows that if the opponents accept the doctrine of momentariness even then there would be no escape for them.]

The Cârvâkas then say—Let it go against our theory, your doctrine of momentariness seems to be true. Let us grant that all elements are momentary. (1887)

Our author with his characteristic humour says—If for your love of truth you are prepared to give up your cherished theory, in that case why not go a step further and accept the best of all truths, i. e. that the elements have no real existence; because the elements have no component parts, nor are they atomic in essence as they have no power to combine. (About this we will speak later on). (1888–9)

We merely imagine the existence of the four elements: they are only reflections of consciousness caused by previous conformations, just as the appearances that manifest in dreams or are produced by magic.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

You may ask:—If the elements are non-existent what else may be the cause of consciousness? We will reply:—It is not necessary to formulate the external elements as the cause of consciousness, because the consciousness has another cause, namely, the consciousness of the previous moment. (1892)

If the first consciousness is caused by a different chain of consciousness, then you must also say whether the latter is the material cause or an auxiliary cause? (1893)

If you take it to be the material cause then in the chain of consciousness of the son there should be the previous impressions of the parents' consciousness. (1894)

It is an universal truth that the effects should have all the qualities of the material cause by the principle of affirmation and negation; the future consciousness must therefore possess all the qualities of the previous consciousness which is its material cause. (1895)

(5) If you hold that the parents' chain of consciousness is the helping cause only then you must answer what the material cause of the first consciousness is? There is none. So you should admit that the chain of consciousness in the son is the result or the continuation of his own previous chain of consciousness. In that case there will be no quarrel between us. (1896)

Therefore, the first consciousness is the result of its own previous consciousness which is its material cause, because such is the nature of consciousness; just as the consciousness of the present moment is the result of the consciousness of the previous moment. (1897)

The other reasons advanced by you being refuted, the first consciousness will spring up spontaneously unless you admit the previous consciousness as the cause of the first consciousness in a new-born child; otherwise, if the consciousness be considered as eternal, it must exist always.

By this the theory of previous birth is established. (1898)

Now about future birth—

The consciousness at the moment of death is endowed with the power to be the efficient cause of the consciousness of the

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

next moment, because it possesses the qualities of passion, desire, etc. and because of its low associations; in much the same way as the immediately preceding consciousness is the efficient cause of the consciousness of death. (1899)

If consciousness be capable of producing another consciousness (in the same body) why cannot it produce the same after death in another body, be it the body of a god, a man or an animal? (1900)

The Cârvâkas now advance a technical objection. They exclaim—We hold that the consciousness is an outcome of the body, and as such your examples (इदानीन्तनचित्तवत् etc. "just as the consciousness of the present moment" etc.) are not acceptable to us: your argument is not valid as the major term is not present in your example. (1901)

Our author replies—Your theory that the body is the material cause of consciousness has already been refuted, and these examples have been given on the assumption that you have already given up your theory and showed a leaning to ours. It has already been said that if the body is the cause of consciousness, then all the different kinds of consciousness will appear simultaneously and not in succession, for you do not acknowledge any helping cause. (1902)

Remembrance and attachment are indeed produced by sensation and contemplation; none can deny that. So you must admit that there is not one kind of knowledge in the body but many. (1903)

Those who practice fine arts, etc. obtain a superior or inferior degree of knowledge in course of time; or, in other words, from the knowledge of one degree is produced the knowledge of a different degree. In such cases as there is difference in degree there must be difference of knowledge also. (1904)

When our mind with one sense-organ is deeply engaged with a particular thing, we are not able to receive sensations through the other sense-organs, but when the mind is disengaged then those sensations are received again. It is therefore proved that there is not one kind of consciousness which remains always in the body. So it is not wrong to say that consciousness of one moment is caused by the consciousness of another moment. (1905)

You have said that the mind of one body cannot produce the mind in another, because the two minds are indicated in different bodies. But this is disproved; because the mind being formless does not require any repository, and therefore no indication of the mind in the body is possible. (1906)

In order to prevent their falling, things like water require some vessel for support. As the mind has no motion why should it require a repository ? (1907)

If you mean by "indication" that the mind is inherent in the body, even then it will be wrong; because according to your theory the mind and the body are not the same. But the inherence of the mind in the body is possible in our case, as we do not consider the external objects as real. (1908)

If you admit the inherence of the mind in the body, then, as your body is perceived by others your feelings of attachment, hatred, etc. ought also to be perceived by others. The Buddhists cannot be open to this charge, as they maintain that the body is only a reflection of the consciousness. (1909)

The phenomena of the mind can be perceived by the mind only, but the body is perceived by the mind as well as by others; so the mind and the body are different. Therefore, the things that are divided in this manner must also be different, just as the root of the belly (which is felt by one) and the actor (perceivable as two different persons, one as an actor and another as the person whom he represents). (1910)

This reason is, of course, not applicable to us, as we accept only one chain of consciousness. Every external object is the reflection of our own consciousness, just as a man with a defective eye perceives two moons, which emanate only from his own consciousness. (1911)

The Cârvâkas reply—The consciousness which is ever perishing, and is ever being produced, seems to us to be a continuous thing. If you think that the consciousness is inherent in the body, then the body also should be momentary. (1912)

Our author answers—If by the word "indication" you

mean simply that the mind is produced by the body, or that it cannot exist anywhere except in the body, even then your middle term or reason will be erroneous. (1913)

The body as we see is becoming different every moment; the previous consciousness (at death) produces in the next moment another consciousness in a different body, and the consciousness is the only connecting link between these bodies. These two different consciousnesses are connected with one another as cause and effect. (1914)

Because the chain of the consciousness which is being destroyed every moment is one and continuous, the consciousnesses of different moments in the same chain are connected as cause and effect.

In the previous and subsequent births also the same chain of consciousness continues. But the chains of consciousness in dissimilar bodies like those of a cow and a horse are not so connected, because the chains are dissimilar. (1915)

How do you know that the consciousness of the emancipated does not produce another consciousness, and why do you give an example like this, as you do not attach any authority on a conclusion considered valid by your opponents? You are evidently unaware that the last consciousness of the emancipated indeed gives rise to another consciousness, [such as, "my life is finished, I have adhered to celibacy, done all that was to be done, and I will not know of a next birth."] (1916)

Your example does not apply also in the case of the Mâdhyamikas, because when the devotees attain Buddhahood they retain the momentary consciousness of the transcendental Nirvâṇa. Even in the cases of the S'râvakas and the Pratyekabuddhas your example is not applicable, because in Buddhism there is only one Yâna namely the Mahâyâna, [while the other Yânas are nothing but ladders]. (1917)

Your example is indeed endowed with the qualities of the major term, and though it is considered valid by your opponents it does neither apply to the Vijñânavâdins nor to any other sects of Buddhism. (1918)

You have said that the consciousness of death does not produce another consciousness, because it is dying,—but you have not said what difficulties will arise in case it does so. This omission gives rise to doubts, namely, that the last consciousness may also produce another consciousness in a different body; so here there is a fallacy of doubt in your argument. (1919)

That in the fœtus there is consciousness is not too bold to assert. Why cannot there be consciousness in the fœtus, even though its organs of sense be undeveloped therein? (1920)

That consciousness is the result of the sense-organs is known to all. If the fœtus having no sense-organs cannot have consciousness and if our assertion is too bold, why then, should it be otherwise in dreams. (1921)

So we should admit that consciousness is not connected with the sense-organs or with external objects; even without these, consciousness is possible. So even in the unconscious state we must admit the presence of consciousness. (1922)

If you think that in the unconscious state and in sleep no consciousness is present but only its potentiality, then you are wrong; the consciousness is always present there in its full identity. (1923)

How can you be certain that the mind is absent in the conditions of sleep and unconsciousness? If you reply—because there is no sensation—then, tell me how you can know that there is no sensation. (1924)

If you reply—because the mind does not feel the presence of consciousness,—in that case, you must acknowledge that there is a mind which feels that it has no consciousness. (1925)

The Cârvâkas say—if you acknowledge that there is consciousness in such conditions, why does not the mind recollect sensations received while in an unconsious state?

Our author replies—because the mind is deprived of the power of recollecting those sensations, just as a new-born child is unable to recollect sensations. (1926-27)

Cârvâkas—Why do you at all accept the presence of consciousness in an unconscious condition?

Our author replies—I have already proved that the first consciousness is the result of a previous consciousness, because the nature of consciousness is such. If you do not accept the presence of consciousness in an unconscious state it will mean death, because you maintain that the destruction of mind is equivalent to death. But what we actually find is that he regains consciousness which is tantamount to another birth; then, there cannot be any death at all in the world, because there is always the possibillity of the production of more than one mind in the same body.

The consciousness in living beings is independent; because it does not require the assistance of sense-organs etc. Being produced by the previous consciousness, it remains in the body just as it remains in dreams. (1928–30)

So the consciousness does not require the help of the objective world, because even without the connection between the sense-organs and the external objects we can have the consciousness of such impossible things as a lotus in the sky. (1931)

Even if the sense-organs and the external objects are existent, we have the power to know the past and the future, just as impossible things like a lotus in the sky can be the subject of our consciousness. (1932)

The image called up by a word is only a reflection of our mind in the form of an object which does not really exist; so external objects have no real existence except in the mind. We have exhaustively dealt with this subject in our examination of the relation existing between the word and its meaning (शब्दार्थपरीक्षा). (1933)

In paralysis and similar diseases the mental faculties remain unchanged; therefore consciousness is not dependent on the body alone. (1934)

But in a disease like the derangement of the optic nerves, even though it be very slight, the consciousness dependent on the eyes only gets changed. (1935)

When a body is destroyed, the consciousness which is not dependent on the body can exist by its own inherent power. So there is nowhere any contradiction. (1936)

In reply to your argument—that consciousness does not pass into another body after death—we may point out that it has already been proved that the consciousness can exist even without the help of the body. It is therefore not difficult for us to explain that the consciousness passes on to another body when the present one is destroyed. (1937)

Because we fail to perceive other bodies to which this consciousness passes on, we have no right to say that they do not exist, in much the same way as a short-sighted man cannot perceive the smoke if it is scanty even though it is present there. (1938)

Though the last consciousness and the next consciousness are to be found in different bodies they are really the parts of the same chain of consciousness, because the next chain of consciousness (in a different body) imitates in the same way the previous chain of consciousness, just as the thread of a story is connected with all the differerent chains of circumstances related therein. (1939)

In the new-born child we find the consciousness of desire for mother's milk, and in its absence the consciousness of anxiety is produced. By this we can infer that the new consciousness is the effect of the consciousness contained in the previous body, which was endowed with similar desires at the time of death. (1940)

From the child's crying, etc. it can be inferred that it has desire, anger and anxiety. These are nothing but manifestations of consciousness which is the result of understanding of the meaning of words (शब्दार्थ). The consciousness of understanding the meaning of words in the child is the result of conformations acquired in the previous birth. (1941)

We have already established that the external objects are nothing but the meanings of words (शब्दार्थ). In the child how can the consciousness of suckling, etc. (which not are real objects but only the meanings of the words or शब्दार्थ) be possible without practice,

(i. e. how can the knowledge of understanding the meanings of words be possible in a new-born child?) If we do not admit previous birth, in that case the child must be without this consciousness. (1942)

This consciousness of desires, etc. is the result of the force of the memory which was in the habit of knowing the meanings of words in the previous birth; because suckling, etc. are forms of consciousness, just as the present consciousness is the result of the previous consciousness. (1943)

Because the consciousness of the new-born babe is the fructification of the force of memory, which was in the habit of knowing the meanings of words in previous birth, the future birth is also established. (1944)

Cârvâkas—If consciousness in a new-born child is the result of the previous practice of knowing the meanings of words, why then they cannot speak or remember immediately they are born, just as a speaker remembers and speaks immediately. (1945)

Our author replies:—Because the faculties of the mind are benumbed and the memory is scattered (by long confinement in the womb) the child cannot at once speak or remember, in much the same way as the faculties are benumbed and the memory is scattered in fever in which there is a simultaneous derangement of the three vital fluids. (1946)

But those who are super-human and whose faculties of mind are not benumbed (in the womb) can indeed speak at once and retain the sharpness of memory immediately they are born. (1947)

For establishing future birth further reasons are enumerated.

The desires of attachment, hatred etc. of this moment must be the effects of the previous indulgence in desires of attachments, hatred, etc. by the principle of affirmative and negative inseparable connection. (1948)

For the child no previous practice is possible in the present birth, but we perceive the feelings of attachment, hatred, etc. in it. What else can be the cause if not another birth? (1949)

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

The feelings of attachment, hatred, etc. are not produced by the proximate presence of the external objects, because when a man is pure in mind and thought, the proximate presence of such objects fails to produce the feelings of attachment, hatred, etc. (1950)

In case the desired thing is lost or not obtained men who are devoid of wisdom feel unhappy and their feelings of attachment, hatred, etc. are increased. (1951)

The thought that women are auspicious, suitable and constant, gives rise to the feelings of attachment, etc. in men; but as a matter of fact these things have no reality. (1952)

So in this birth those feelings of attachment, etc. are produced in children as a result of the practice of similar feelings of attachment, etc. in the previous birth; they do not spring up with the assistance of the external objects, just as the future feelings of attachment, etc. are produced by the previous feelings of a similar nature in the present life. (1953)

The immediate presence of objects is not the material cause of the feelings of attachmant, etc; the presence of objects only recalls to the mind the memory of past experiences of a similar nature. (1954)

Those who are not pure in mind and those who are prone to desire constantly, get the sufferings, such as the feelings of attachment, etc. according to their intensity of desire. So the presence of a thing is the material cause only of the previous memory; otherwise, it would have always produced the same consciousness in the minds of all perceivers. (1955–1956)

By noticing the feelings of others, or by hearing from others, these feelings of attachment, etc. are not produced, because even without hearing or noticing, the feelings of attachment etc. are produced in the new-born child. (1957)

The minds of animals which do not perceive or hear of the feelings of others are agitated when they come in contact with other animals (females) of the same species. (1958)

In this life the previously inexperienced merits such as of knowledge, virtue, compassion, etc. are not seen coming out of their own accord in some individuals, in much the same way as an elephant's rut comes out of its own accord.

So the theory of the previous and future births must be accepted. (1959)

The feelings of attachment, etc. are not the products of vital fluids like phlegm, bile, and wind, because contrary results are seen in men according to their purity of conscience. (1960)

As the feelings of attachment, etc. in a new-born child are the results of the experience in previous births, the previous birth is established; therefore, atheism in this respect is exploded. (1961)

The Cârvâkas now get impatient and say–What are you going to prove? Is it that the feelings, etc. of this birth are the result of previous experiences in this birth; (ii) or in the previous birth or (iii) are these the result of previous experience only?

(i) The first is disproved by the fact that the first consciousness can have no previous experience of feelings in this birth. (ii) The second is disproved because your example is fallacious, as it is devoid of the major term, because we do not admit previous birth. How then can there be practice in previous birth? (iii) The third is disproved, because with the same reason (viz., the nature of consciousness in such) we can prove the contrary, that is, the feelings of attachment, etc. are not produced by the experience of previous births. (1962–1963)

The author replies—The thesis we seek to prove is your third alternative, viz. that the feelings of attachment, etc. are the results of experience only. The reasons we have given, cannot, as you claim, prove the contrary; there is no contradiction in our argument inasmuch as we consider the first consciousness of yours in the child to be nothing but the result of experience which must necessarily have been gained in a previous birth. (1964)

§ 6. S'ântarakṣita as a Philosopher.

From the very opening lines of the Tattvasaṅgraha the views of the author can easily be collected. In the course of the twenty-seven different examinations also he gives his own views quite profusely; and in this section we propose to collect these views and attempt to give an idea as to the form of Buddhism current in the time of S'ântarakṣita. In the Prakṛtiparîkṣâ he dismisses the doctrine of Primordial Matter as the cause of the universe as formulated by the Sâṁkhyas, but says that the doctrine of existent effect in the cause or of the non-existence of the effect in the cause are both untenable, because there is no object existent in the world except the Vijñâna or consciousness which is momentary[1]. In the Îs'varaparîkṣâ he disproves the theory of one, eternal and omniscient creator, as formulated by the Naiyâyikas, but says that the reasons adduced by the Naiyâyikas to establish God can only prove the existence of many and finite intelligences as the creators. The Buddhists also accept that the creators of the universe are persons or rather the chains of Vijñâna who create according to their good and bad actions done in the previous births[2]. Further he says that the Buddhists do not believe that after the destruction of the universe the souls remain without consciousness, but hold that the chain of consciousness remains even after the destruction either in the heavens assigned to the gods or in some other spheres according to its good and bad actions, with the same memory, conformations, etc.; and subsequently in the beginning of the creation it does not require the help of God to receive instruction on matters of conventionality[3]. In the same Parîkṣâ, S'ântarakṣita further says that according to the Vijñâna-vâdin's theory there is nothing in the world except the consiousness which is endowed with different forms. These forms are also produced in accordance with the actions done in the previous births. On these grounds no creator is required, because there is nothing that is to be created. In the Ubhayaparîkṣâ he rejects the dualistic theory, as held by the Seśvara Sâṃkhyas, of God and Matter as causes of the universe, on the ground that if both these are eternal then everything would be created, protected, and destroyed at once, and not in succession or by the process of evolution. In the Svabhâvaparîkṣâ he rejects the theory that the universe is self-existent and is causeless. In the S'abdabrahmaparîkṣâ he dismisses the theory as held by the Grammarians that S'abdabrahma is eternal, and the objective world is nothing but the result of this sound. The world appears as different from the sound because of Avidyâ or ignorance. Incidentally Kamalaśîla explains the Buddhist view of Avidyâ and Mokṣa. He says that we consider the tendency of the mind surcharged with the conformations of previous births as Avidyâ (ignorance). When this Avidyâ is destroyed by constant meditation so as to give rise to the chain of consciousness which is pure and free from the seeds of conformations, it is then called as having obtained emancipation[1]. In the Âtmaparîkṣâ, replying to the Naiyâyikas the author says that though we Buddhists do not accept an Âtman as the acknowledger of all kinds of knowledge, we admit indeed a Sarvajña or omniscient as the perceiver of all varieties of knowledge. Others admit that by attaining superhuman powers all kinds of knowledge can be known. So there is nothing new in your doctrine of Âtman. But the Vijñânavâdins admit that all Vijñânas rise independent of the subject and the object and they are not acknowledged by anything else[2]. While examining the theory of Âtman as propounded by the Advaitins, he says that according to this theory the Âtman being always emancipated the bondage and emancipation cannot be explained; but according to the theory of the Vijñânavâdins, in which everybody is admitted to have a different chain of momentary consciousness, bondage may be explained as a condition of the Vijñâna which is surcharged with impure tendencies; and emancipation as a condition of the Vijñâna which is free from all impure tendencies, conformations, etc[1]. There is a good deal of similarity between the Âtman of the Advaitins and the Vijñâna of the Vijñânavâdins, and the only difference between the two seems to be that while the Advaitins formulate the Âtman as eternal the Vijñânavâdins consider their Vijñâna to be momentary. While refuting the Pudgalavâda of the Vâtsîputrîyas, our author says that Buddha never refuted the Pudgala simply because he had to look to the mental condition of his pupils. As he was not bold enough to repudiate the theory he taught that it cannot be known separately. In some places the Pudgala is said by him as the bearer of burdens, and he meant thereby the chains of the momentary Skandhas collectively as Pudgala and as the bearer of burdens[2].

In the Sthirabhâvaparîkṣâ detailed information is given by both S'ântarakṣita and his commentator on the most interesting doctrine of momentariness or the Kṣaṇikavâda. He says if the entities are accepted as momentary, the helping conditions help the material cause in producing a particular effect. In the first moment the helping conditions and the material cause assembled in one place change themselves in the next moment in such a way as to be capable of producing the result, and in the next moment the result is produced. The assisting conditions may also be called the causes, as they help the material cause in producing the effect.

The author in the same parîkṣâ proceeds to explain the notion of destruction in conformity with the doctrine of momentariness. There are two kinds of destructions, he says, namely, the disappearance of momentary entities, and the destruction which gives rise to a dissimilar kind of momentary entities. The first has no cause: all entities are constantly undergoing a process of change, an entity of one moment giving rise to another in the next. The second kind of destruction has causes and assisting conditions. Take, for instance, a pot which is complete in one moment and which when destroyed with a stick, etc. gives rise to the pieces in the next moment. This is what our author thinks to be the second kind of destruction which has causes in contradistinction with the first kind which is causeless.[1]

In the Karmaphalaparîkṣâ S'ântarakṣita replies to the most grave objection that is levelled against the doctrine of momentriness inasmuch as if everything is momentary, the Vijñâna of one moment which does an action cannot remain in subsequent moments to enjoy its result, and the Vijñâna of a subsequent moment which does not perform the action has to enjoy the result of the previous action whether good or bad, which is unjust. S'ântarakṣita replies that the Vijñâna which does an action produces another Vijñâna in the next moment with the same conformations, etc. and this process goes on infinitely. In this way, in the same chain of momentary Vijñânas which are related to each other by the law of causation, the action and its results can be explained[2]. In the same way, he says, memory can also be explained. The Vijñâna which perceives and begets conformations in one moment, produces in the next moment the memory of the perception and conformations experienced in the previous moment, in the same chain of consciousness. In the same parîkṣâ he sharply demarcates between an ordinary and emancipated chains of Vijñâna. Persons whose chain of consciousness is impure with impure tendencies and conformations will be doing actions that will lead to his own enjoyment, while the persons whose chain of Vijñâna is pure feel that all things are momentary and that there is no soul, and they engage themselves in doing good actions only according to their perfect conformations[1]. We thus see the importance of Karuṇâ or compassion in Mahâyânism as against the egoistic emancipation in the Hînayana. Our author in the subsequent examinations refutes the Naiyâyika and Vaiśeṣika notions of Substance, Quality, Action, Generality, Particularity, Inherence, etc. These notions directly go against the Buddhist theory of momentariness, and hence our author has taken some pains in refuting them. But as a matter of fact when the momentariness of everything is established, and it has also been proved that there is nothing real except the chains of consciousness, and when the existence of the objective world is denied altogether, there hardly remains anything, such as the substance, quality etc. which are here disproved.

In the S'abdârthaparîkṣâ our author explains the Buddhist doctrine of Apoha which is very interesting but at the same time extremely difficult to understand or to realise. When a word is uttered what does it signify? Does it signify an object or does it produce an effect only in the mind, and if so, of what kind? The Vijñânavâdin will not accept an objective world because there is no room for such a contingency in it. When the existence of an objective world is denied then the difficulty arises. In order to escape from this difficulty the Buddhists take recourse to the doctrine of Apoha or the negation of the opposite. S'ântarakṣita says that it is Apoha which is signified by the word. The word and the Apoha are related to each other as cause and effect; the word is the cause and the Apoha is the effect. As soon as the word cow, for instance, is uttered, it gives rise to the knowledge of a cow which is by nature the negation of the opposite, or in other words, which is different from a not-cow; when a cow is said as cow and by no other word, the word itself means the negation of the opposite. When we explain a cow as different from horse, etc. it shows that Apoha is the meaning of the word. The knowledge created in the mind is the meaning of the word; that knowledge is of the nature of Apoha. Therefore Apoha must be the meaning of the word[1]. In the Pratyakṣaparîkṣâ and the Anumânaparîkṣa S'ântarakṣita mainly follows the definition of perception and inference as given by Diṅnâga and subsequently modified by Dharmakîrti. In the Pramâṇântaraparîkṣâ he dismisses the S'abda, Upamâna, Arthâpatti Abhâva, Anupalabdhi, Sambhava, Aitihya, etc. as invalid proofs. Besides perception and inference there are no valid proofs according to our author. In the Syâdvâdaparîkṣâ our author refutes the favourite Jaina doctrine of Syâdvâda, and in the Traikâlyaparîkṣâ he criticises the views of four eminent Buddhist Bhadantas on the three times, present, past and future as was previously done by Vasubandhu in his Abhidharmakoṣa. The knowledge of past, present and future is unreal; an action done in the present moment produces many momentary results one after another in succession, but our delusion leads us to think that the same action gives the result. It is only the emancipated, depending as they do on their purified chain of Vijñâna, can predict the future or recall the past by seeing the present things only in the same way as the Tathâgata did before[2].

In the Lokâyataparîkṣâ, while refuting the Lokâyatas who are no believers in the previous or future births, or in other words, in the theory of transmigration, S'ântarakṣita incidentally gives much valuable information. After death, he says, the Vijñâna leaves the body and gets into another, and that is what is called Paraloka or after world.[1] It is nothing but a stage of Vijñâna. The first Vijñâna of a child does not result from the body but it is a continuation of the Vijñâna (of death) in the last body which died. In other words, the last Vijñâna of death produces in the next moment the first consciousness in the child. The chain of momentary consciousness, according to S'ântarakṣitâ, is eternal and is without a beginning or an end. This chain changes bodies and is going on eternally through a succession of births and rebirths. It may pass into body of a God if actions done were good, or into the bodies of animals, ghosts and demons if the actions were bad. In the Bahirarthaparîkṣâ, S'ântarakṣita replies to some of the most grave objections that are brought against the Vijñânavâdin theory that there is no objective world except the Vijñâna. He says even without the presence of an object we see Vijñâna arising with the form of that object. When once it is possible why not in all cases? Owing to different tendencies of the mind many Vijñânas are rising one after another with the forms of objects, just as a man with a troubled eye perceives two moons or one with a jaundiced eyes sees the white conch as yellow. Are there really two moons or is the conch yellow? These Vijñânas have no corresponding objects, but they are Vijñânas all the same. So what is the necessity of admitting the existence of an objective world? By perception the outward world cannot be proved. The Vijñâna of perception must have, for instance, a black form because otherwise black objects cannot be reflected in it. If the form of Vijñâna is black and there is something else as a black object then there will be two cognitions of black which is absurd. In the two subsequent examinations he denies or disproves the authority of the Vedas and the doctrine of self-evidence.

For understanding the Buddhistic views as held by the Vijñânavâdins the last examination or the Sarvajñaparîkṣâ is of more than a passing interest, and this examination is replete with information on a number of important doctrines held by different schools in Buddhism. This chapter, if separately studied, will give many more important information than are brought together here obviously for want of space and time, and a study of it, we venture to say, will well repay the labours of the investigator. In this examination S'ântarakṣita and his disciple Kamalaśîla present very interesting solutions of a number of problematic questions which usually confront a student of Buddhist literature. We will here deal with only a few topics such as the author's conception of Omniscience, which can be obtained by the removal of the two kinds of veils, viz., the veil of suffering and the veil covering the transcendental truth, his reasons to establish an Omniscient Buddha, the fundamental distinction between the Mahâyâna and Hînayâna, his definition of a Bodhisattva and the conception of Nirvâṇa according to the standpoints of the two great divisions of Buddhism.

Every system of philosophy, our author says, has a founder who shows the correct way leading to emancipation. He must have many special qualities one of them being Omniscience or the power to know all things of the universe. That Sarvajña, by having a knowledge of such impure things as wine, etc. through the different sense-organs, cannot contract impurity which leads to rebirth and sufferings; because the objective world has no real existence except the Vijñâna, and the purity, etc. are only the reflections of the Vijñâna. Further, the persons or more properly the chains of Vijñâna who realize the highest truth of voidness in everything and constantly meditate on S'ûnyatâ and instruct others to follow this line of meditation for the attainment of salvation,—all are able as a matter of fact to be omniscient. Buddha must be considered as omniscient because he was the first to realize the voidness of the universe and to instruct pepole on this highest truth. How can Kapila, Vardhamâna, etc. who accept entities as permanent and formulate Syâdvâda which is opposed even to perception, be called Sarvajñas[1]?

Then our author proceeds to explain how the realization of Nairâtmya leads to the attainment of omniscience, or the quality of knowing all things. There are two kinds of obstructions, says our author, which when destroyed by the realization of the voidness of the Universe, lead to the attainment of omniscience. The first is called Kles'âvaraṇa or the obstruction of suffering, and the second is Jñeyâvaraṇa or the obstruction hiding the transcendental truth. The sufferings are the feelings such as of attachment, hatred, etc. which are indeed hindrances to know a thing as it is. The other obstruction is the want of perfect knowledge or the highest truth, and the inability to impart that true knowledge to others for their benefit.[1]

The first kind of veil or obstruction can be removed by the realization of the voidness of the Universe alone. The feelings of attachment, hatred, etc. indeed result in the first kind of obstruction, and these impure feelings are caused not by the external objects but by the constant practice of thinking the Ego as real. The realization of Nairâtmya destroys the Ego and its connection with the surrounding objects, which are unreal, as also the feelings of attachment, hatred, etc. which are only the outcome of thinking the Ego as real.[2] The constant meditation on Nairâtmya (non-Ego) removes the veil, and the ascetic is then after considerable practice able to discover that everything is void. This kind of intense meditation leads to the realization of Nairâtmya of the Universe in a way very similar to a man's perception of a lovely damsel, about whom he is constantly thinking and keenly meditating. The constant thinking of the Ego and its connection with the objective world, once destroyed by the realization of Nairâtmya would not possibly come up again in that chain of Vijñâna, because the S'râvakas and Pratyekas, who are mortally afraid of the cycle of existence, and desire emancipation only for the self, stand always in need of this kind of meditation to extinct the Ego altogether from their chain of Vijñana. The Mahâyânists, on the other hand, who are imbued with their unbounded feeling of compassion for the suffering humanity, and are always prepared to help all beings troubled with great sufferings, and who meditate the Universe as their own self, are induced by their feeling of compassion to have the meditation for the realization of Nairâtmya.[1] In other words, while the Hînayânist is selfish the Mahâyânist is selfless in the matter of removing the first kind of veil by meditation on the Nairâtmya in everything.

The second kind of obstruction, namely the veil covering the transcendental truth, can only be removed by constant meditation of Nairâtmya with great reverence, and without cessation. By meditating in this way the veil is removed and the ascetic becomes omniscient, and on this lies the most fundamental difference between the Hînayâna and the Mahâyâna. Though the S'râvakas and the Pratyekas are able to realize the Nairâtmya, they cannot obtain omniscience because of their inability to identify themselves with the Universe, as the Mahâyânists are able to do by their unbounded compassion for the suffering humanity.[2] The Hînayâna or the lower vehicle therefore is an easier path leading to salvation whereas the Mahâyâna or the greater vehicle is much more difficult inasmuch it involves a great self-sacrifice without the prospect of obtaining any reward.

S'ântarakṣita next goes on to prove that Sugata alone is Sarvajña because he was the first to meditate the whole universe as void (Nirâtma), to identify it with his own self, and instruct others on this transcendental truth. Sugata was the first to conceive the unreality of the Universe and to definitely proclaim it as nothing but the embodiment of the five Skandhas: he gave this instruction without any contradiction, and preached the four Noble Truths after realizing perfectly that the world is full of sorrow. He stands at the head of all philosophers, because he alone traced the cause of this cycle of existence in desires, which are necessarily the outcome of the philosophy of the realization of the Ego as taught by Kapila and others, and because he showed that the sufferings can only be destroyed by realizing everything as non-Ego, or in other words, by destroying individuality.[1]

Our author next proceeds to show the distinction between the two classes of Vijñânavâdins, who differ on the question of the apparent inconsistency of simultaneous meditation and speech on the part of the omniscient Sugata, inasmuch as when the Sarvajña meditates he cannot impart the results of his meditations, and when he speaks he cannot meditate and be Sarvajña. One class of Vijñânavâdins hold that the Sarvjña does not speak when he meditates on the Nairâtmya of the Universe and its sufferings, but he instructs on the truth experienced during meditation after coming out of the Dhyâna;[2] while the second class of Vijñânavâdins hold that even when the Sarvajña is in meditation the words of instruction can come out without his knowledge owing to his previous merit and transcendental knowledge.[3] This is quite possible because the Vijñânavâdins postulate that the Sarvajña does not speak but others think as if he speaks. The Sarvajña in fact is nothing but a chain of Vijñâna and what it thinks is transmitted into the different chains of Vijñânas surrounding it, and through them to the rest of the world or properly speaking to the other chains of Vijñâna.

The most interesting topic, namely the nature of Nirvâṇa, as conceived by our author and his commentator, then follows and it is useful to note our author's views in this connection. A Bodhisattva's chain of Vijñâna, our author explains, because of its unbounded sympathy and compassion for the suffering world, does not merge into the S'ûnya and thus lose its form, individuality and activity: it does not care to obtain salvation until all creatures realize the truth of Nairâtmya of the Universe and obtain Nirvâṇa consequent thereon. We thus see the necessity of setting up in Mahâyânism the ideal Bodhisattva in the form of Avalokiteśvara, who refused salvation, though fully entitled to it, until all creatures of the Universe obtain salvation, as early as the first century A. D. in the Sukhâvatîvyûha and then in the Kâraṇḍavyûha which was translated into Chinese in about the third century A. D.

Another important difference between the Mahâyâna and Hînayâna lies in the fact that the S'râvakas and the Pratyekas who are devoid of compassion for the suffering humanity obtain their Nirvâṇa soon, as they have not to wait for the salvation of others: they obtain Nirvâṇa as soon as they are qualified for it, whereas the Mahâyânists cannot or will not accept it, even though entitled to it, simply because all others are still immersed in the sea of Samsâra and are undergoing untold sufferings.[1] A Mahâyânist therefore cannot obtain Nirvâṇa or salvation; he must exist, and he must have activities, and must always exert for the uplift of all beings guided by their unbounded sense of compassion. The reward held out for the selfish Hinayânist is Nirvâṇa, whereas the reward for the selfless Mahâyânist is Omniscience. According to the Mahâyânists Buddha also is not emancipated, and he has not merged himself in S'ûnya but his chain of Vijñâna is still active, and from him comes the inspiration to all the other chains of Vijñâna, and from him comes the instructions on Dharma.

S'ântarakṣita next goes on to prove the superiority of Buddha's teachings as the highest Dharma even when viewed in accordance with the tenets of the Tîrthika philosophers. Nothing, he says, is wanting in Buddha's teachings: they are perfect. Buddha took into account the two-fold benefit that people are apt to obtain by following his advices; they can either obtain happiness in this world or emancipation for ever hereafter. He instructed his people that if happiness is to be obtained in this world, if long life, health, knowledge, super-human powers. etc., are to be obtained, then Mudrâ, Mandala, Mantra and meditation should be practised. But if real emancipation or freedom from the cycle of existence is the goal in that case Nairâtmya is to be realized, and this realization of Nairâtmya by removing all selfish thoughts will lead to emancipation.[1]

While comparing his system with other systems of philosophy S'ântarakṣita further says that the knowledge of soul is nothing but the chain of knowledge completely shorn of the impurities which are only external and are merely outside influences.[1] The pure knowledge is that which does not feel the difference of the subject from the object, and in consequence does not get desires which are the causes of sufferings and the consequential cycle of births and rebirths. By this kind of instruction, which is wanting even in Lord Kṛṣṇa's teachings, Buddha has rightly been termed as the foremost of all the greatest philosophers, and is considered an immortal and a Divine Being[2]. To support the divinity of Buddha our author quotes the Buddhist scriptures (Âgamas) and gives a piece of very useful information. He says that in the heaven occupied by the Akaniṣṭha Devas, there is a portion which excludes the Suddhâvâsa gods and which is dedicated to the Âryas. Above this there is the Mahes'varabhavana or 'the abode of Maheśvara'. When the Bodhisattva takes the last birth after crossing the ten Bhûmis he is born here and immediately under his suzerainty one Buddha is born in this world. When the Bodhisattva enters the abode of Mahes'vara he obtains omniscience and remains there until all the Universe is liberated, prior to his disappearance in Nirvâṇa.[3] The Bodhisattva is always compassionate and ever solicitous for the well-being of the inmates of the Universe, and his chain of Vijñâna is ever active. From this the conclusion is inevitable that Sugata Buddha the omniscient is still residing in his abode and he is still active and will continue to do so, so long the world is not delivered. With the delivery of the world and with the emancipation of the inmates of the Saṁsâra all Bodhisattvas will enter Nirvâṇa and be emancipated.

§ 7. Authors mentioned in the Tattvasaṅgraha.

One of the most important features of the Tattvasaṅgraha is that it mentions a large number of hitherto unknown authors and philosophers whose views it records and refutes at length. It is needless to point out that S'ântarakṣita has done valuable service by recording the views of a large number of authors and showing at once the lines of thought and contributions made by each in his own sphere. We may take it for certain that S'ântarakṣita and Kamalas'îla, while stating the views of the different authors, named only those who were the first and pioneer propounders of such views. In tracing the development of Indian thought therefore S'ântarakṣita's services are unparalleled inasmuch as he presents to us enough material for further research in a field which is always regarded as dark and mysterious in the realm of Indian Culture. Besides Buddha and the authors of the philosophical Sûtras there are mentioned a number of important authors from Kambalâs'vatara down to Ubeyaka or Bhavabhûti, in the Tattvasaṅgraha and we will, in the following pages, endeavour to give an account of these authors, the views held by them, and with the available materials establish the periods in which they flourished, taking into account the new materials supplied by the Tattvasaṅgraha.

Kambalâs'vatara.

B. C. 550–500.

In the Lokâyatapariksâ S'ântarakṣita mentions one Kambalâs'vatara[1] who was a follower of the Lokâyata System and who held the view that consciousness results from the body and disappears with the dissolution of the body. Our author quotes a Sûtra[1] which is attributed to Kambalâs'vatara. Who this Kambalâs'vatara was is very difficult to ascertain. A Kambalâs'vatara we have so far been able to trace is mentioned in the Saṅgîtâloka[2] by Bhuvanânanda Kavikaṇṭhâbharaṇa as being one of the early authorities on the science of Music who is there referred to along with the Ṛṣis, Tumburu, Vâyu, Nârada etc. This shows that Kambalâs'vatara flourished at a very remote age. It is not at all strange that a member of a materialist sect should devote himself to music: disbelieving in transmigration of soul or in a future life the cultivation of pleasure in this life would seem logical and entirely proper. It is further not unreasonable to suppose that Kambalâs'vatara was one of the earliest writers of the Lokâyata System if not the chief propounder of the Lokâyata doctrines. Mm. Haraprasad Shâstri in a very recent article[3] gave vent to his belief that Ajitakes'akambalî was one of the chief expounders of the Lokâyata dogmas, and we are tempted to identify our Kambalâs'vatara with this Ajitakes'akambalî, one of the herecical teachers, who flourished in Buddha's life time. The idetification is strengthened by the fact that Ajitakes'akambalî's views were the same as those held by Kambalâs'vatara and other Lokâyatas mentioned in the Tattvasaṅgraha, including the idea that consciousness is an outcome of the body, and that it disappears with the dissolution of the body. It is known from Pali sources that Ajitakes'akambalî "naively denied the possibility of rebirth and retribution. The world is just a concourse of four elements, the space being the repository of the senses, the soul being just a chemical product of matter and nothing more".[4] It is therefore probable that both Ajitakeaks'ambalî and Kambalâs'vatara are names of one and the same person. As Ajitakes'akambalî was a contemporary of Buddha and Mahâvîra, he may be placed tentatively between 550 and 500 B. C.

Vasumitra.

100 A. D.

Vasumitra, whose views are recorded in the Traikâlyapariksâ by S'ântarakṣita,[1] was one if not the chief of the five hundred Arhats who formed the synod convoked by king Kaniska.[2] He is to be distinguished from the disciple of the same name of Guṇamati, who is mentioned by Yasomitra the commentator of Abhidharmakoṣa by Vasubandhu. Vas'umitra is also regarded by the Chinese as the seventh patriarch, but the time assigned to him by the Chinese tradition as recorded by Mr. Edkins[3] does not agree with the existing chronology. The legendary account of the earlier patriarchs, especially before As'vaghoṣa, the 12th patriarch, as given in Edkins[4], makes us entertain great doubts as to the authenticity of the list, especially with regard to the earlier portion. In Nanjio's catalogue[5] four works are attributed to Vasumitra:—

1. Abhidharmaprakaraṇapâda, an original work of the Sarvâstivâdin School.

2. Abhidharmadîpatukâyapâda, another original work of the same school. Yas'omitra the commentator of Abhidharmakoṣa attributes it to Pûrṇa.

3. Aṣṭâdas'anikâyas'âstra, a work on the views of the eighteen different schools of Buddhism, viz., Sarvâstivâda, Kaśyapîya, Mahîśâsaka, Dharmaguptîya, Bahuśrutîya, Tâmras'âṭîya, Vaibha-

4. Aryavasumitrabodhisattvasaṅgîtis'âstra.

In the Tattvasaṅgraha Bhadanta Vasumitra is held in high esteem, though his views on the three times past, present and future are refuted along with the views of Dharmatrâta, Buddhadeva and Ghoṣaka. The first author to refute all these views is Vasubandhu.[1] Vasumitra held that an entity does not differ when passing through the three times, past, present and future. But it is regarded as past with respect to the action which has the power to produce a result. When the action is going on it is called present; when an entity discontinues action it is called past; and when the action is going to happen it is called the future.

Dharmatrâta.

100 A. D.

Dharmatrâta's views are also refuted by our author in the Traikâlyaparîkṣâ.[2] His views are also are referred to and refuted by Vasubandhu in his Abhidharmakoṣa.[3] Nanjio[4] informs us that he was the maternal uncle of Vasumitra, who was one of the most important members in the Council of Kaniska. It is said in the preface of San Zui, dated A. D. 399, that Dharmatrâta collected one thousand verses, all spoken by Buddha, in thirty-three chapters and called the collection Dhammapada. Then he recorded the original account of each verse as a commentary and called it Avadâna. His Dhammapada was translated into Chinese in the year 224 A. D. The following works are attributed to him in Nanjio's Catalogue:—

1. Pañcavastuvibhâṣâs'âstra, a commentary on the work of Vasumitra. The example of an uncle writing a commentary on his nephew's work is very rare in Sanskrit literature.

2. Saṁyuktâbhidharmahṛdayas'âstra, a commentary on the work of Dharma Jina(?).

3. Avadânasûtra or the Dharmapada with the Avadâna.

4. Dharmatrâtadhyânasûtra.

His views on the three times is akin to the theory of the Sâṁkhyas. He holds that in all its changes the essence of a thing which enters the three times may be considered as always existing. In all the three existences the essence of a thing which changes is continuous.

150 A. D.

Another author whose views are referred to by our author in the Traikâlyaparîkṣâ is Bhadanta Ghoṣa or Ghoṣaka, who is unknown in Sanskrit, but one of whose work is still preserved in Chinese translation. Nanjio[1] informs us that he wrote a work entitled the Abhidharmâmṛtas'âstra which was translated into Chinese between A. D. 220–265 under the Wei Dynasty. The name of the translator is not known. It is quite likely that he was one the members of the synod convoked by Kaniska and contemporaneous with the other authors, Vasumitra, Dharmatrâta and Buddhadeva, all of whom took part in the discussion on the three times, past, present and future—a problem which seems to have agitated the minds of many great philosophers and logicians in India. The latest date that can be assigned to him is however cir. 150, allowing about 70 years for the work to obtain sufficient fame before its translation into Chinese. The earlier author to refute his views is Vasubandhu.[2] Ghoṣaka held that an element is always passing through the three times, past, present and future. When it is present it certainly retains the seeds of the past and the future, like a man who loves one woman but does not give up his attachment for other women.

Buddhadeva.

200 A. D.

Buddhadeva[1] also appears in the Traikâlyaparikṣâ, but unlike his compeers he is unknown in Chinese translations. Vasubandhu, in his Abhidharmakoṣa, refuted his views[2], and all that we can say about his time is that he flourished before Vasubandhu, and the latest date that can be assigned him is cir. 200. But it is quite likely that he flourished in the time of Kaniska and was a contemporary of Vasumitra. With regard to the three times he maintained that an entity remains the same in all its changes of time. But it is known as past, present and future in view of its three conditions. The entity which is in its previous condition is called future; that which has already obtained the previous condition and is going to have the after condition is called present; and that which is in its after condition only is called past; in the same way as a woman is called a mother and daughter in view of her relationship to her son and father.

Vâtsyâyana.

250–300 A. D.

Vâtsyâyana being the first commentator on the Nyâyasûtras of Akṣapâda is very frequently referred to by our author. About the date of Vâtsyâyana there is considerable difference of opinion. Dr. Vidyabhusana[3] seems to think that because Vâtsyâyana did not refute the antagonistic theories of Vasubandhu with regard to syllogism he must be earlier than Vasubandhu (280–360 A. D.). He was certainly earlier than Diṅnâga[4] because his theories are controverted by the latter. The correct date of Vâtsyâyana, however, can only be ascertained when a tolerably correct date is fixed for the version of the Nyâyasûtras on which the author commented. Eminent scholars[1] are of opinion that the Sûtras of Akṣapâda have not come down to us in their original form, as they contain many matters which are decidedly later, for instance, the S'ûnyavâda, Vijñânavâda, Vâhyârthabhaṅga[2], etc. The Chinese and Japanese traditions ascribe Nine Reasons and Fourteen Fallacies to Akṣapâda[3]. But in the present Sûtras there are many more matters besides these nine reasons and fourteen fallacies. Mm. Haraprasâd Shâstri[4] in an article contributed to the JBORS claims that the body of the original Sûtras was originally meant as a work of pure logic for the regulation of debates. Some of the commentators on the Sûtras who flourished before Vâtsyâyana, but whose works are lost, interpolated a number of additional Sûtras in order to give the original Sûtras a philosophical colour, and to transform the original work into a treatise of philosophy. Thus new Buddhist ideas were thrown in and refuted in the Nyâyasûtras which have come down to us. The Laṅkâvatârasûtra is perhaps the first and earliest work on the Vijñânavâda, and Nâgârjuna is the first scholar to start the S'ûnyavâda and to found the school of Buddhism known as the Mâdhyamika school. If we take this into account then we find that the present redaction of the Nyâyasûtras was completed after Nâgârjuna whom we have elsewhere placed in 181 A. D.[5] The date of the present redaction of the Nyâyasûtras cannot therefore be placed before A. D. 200. Further the Laṅkavatârasûtra was thrice translated into Chinese by Guṇabhadra in 443 A. D., Bodhiruci in 513 and by S'ikṣânanda between 700-704 A. D.[6] It is quite reasonable therefore to assign the composition of the original sûtra to the beginning of the third century. Therefore the date of the Nyâyasûtras will be more recent than that of the Laṅkâvatârasûtra. The earliest date we can assign to Vâtsyâyana will therefore be the middle or end of the third century A. D., and in that case he will be somewhat earlier than Vasubandhu, which will explain Vâtsyâyana's reticence about the antagonistic theories of syllogism as propounded by Vasubandhu. Îśvarakṛṣṇa[1] was influenced by Vâtsyâyana, and Diṅnâga[2] actually criticised him. Vâtsyâyana quoted[3] a passage from Kautilyâ's Arthashâstra, and he criticised the Buddhist doctrines of momentariness, voidness and the idealism or the Vijñânavâda. The acceptance of the proposed date for Vâtsyâyana will harmonize all the known facts about the author and his contemporeries.

S'abarasvâmin.

S'abarasvâmin, the great Mîmâṁsâ philosopher, and one of the pioneer commentators of the Jaiminîyasûtras, is mentioned by our author, and is several times referred to and criticised in the Tattvasaṅgraha.[4] Dr. Ganganath Jha[5] believes him to be the father of Vikramâditya the founder of the Vikrama Era, on the strength of a tradition that S'abara had four wives of four different castes, and that Vikramâditya was born of the Kṣatriya wife. But this does not seem to be correct. S'abarasvâmin refers to the S'ûnyavâda and the Vijñânavâda,[6] and actually mentions the Mahâyânikas[7] by name. Mahâyâna was very feebly represented in the Council of Kaniṣka; it was after Nâgârjuna they made headway.[1] It is also doubtful whether the distinction between Mahâyâna and Hînayâna as drawn in the Prajñâpâramitâ[2] met with a general acceptance before the time of Asaṅga, in whose Mahâyânasûtrâlaṅkâra elaborate distinction is drawn between Mahâyâna and Hînayâna. S'abarasvâmin was in all probability later than Nâgârjuna and belonged to a period ranging from 250-300 A. D., and we shall not be altogether mistaken if we make S'abara a contemporary of Vâtsyâyana.

Vindhyavâsin.

250-320 A. D.

A Sâṁkhya author by name Vindhyavâsin is mentioned in the Tattvasaṅgraha.[3] He seems to be identical with the same teacher who was reputed to be one of the Sâṁkhya authoritites when Vasubandhu was living. In Paramârtha's Life of Vasubandhu[4] it is recorded that Vindhyavâsin was successful in a dispute with Buddhamitra a teacher of Vasubandhu, and got a reward of three lacs of gold from king Vikramâditya of Ayodhya. After this triumph he returned to the Vindhya mountains and died there. Vasubandu eventually heard of the shame of his teacher and searched for the rival philosopher in the Vindhya mountains. Finding however that the heretic was dead he composed a book called the Paramârthasaptati in opposition to the new Sâṁkhyaśâstra of Vindhyavâsin[5]. The works of Vindhyavâsin and Vasubandhu are lost and are not to be found even in Chinese translations. Paramârtha is at present our earliest authority on Vasubandhu and his words about the intellectual fight between these two celebrities demand respect and authority. Attempts have been made to identify Vindhyavâsin with Îśvarakṛṣṇa,[1] but as it is opposed to all Indian traditions this identification seems to have no value. Kamalas'îla in his commentary mentions these two separately and gives Rudrila as the proper name of Vindhyavâsin. Moreover, if we are correct in our supposition we can point out one s'loka in the Tattvasaṅgraha which is in all probability a quotation from the now lost work of Vasubandhu called the Paramârthasaptati. The S'loka is:—

यदेव दधि तत् क्षीरं यत् क्षीरं तद्दधीति च ।
वदता रुद्दिलेनैव ख्यापिता विन्ध्यवासिता ॥[2]

The ground on which Vindhyavâsin is identified with Îs'varakṛṣṇa may be summarized thus:—Paramârtha while going to China took away with him a large number of Sanskrit books of reputed authors, and among them a work which is indifferently called Hiraṇyasaptati, Suvarṇasaptati and Sâṁkhyasaptati. This work was accompanied with a commentary of an unknown author. The text agrees with the Sanskrit work known to us by the name of Sâṃkhyasaptati of Îs'varakṛṣṇa, which has been several times printed in Sanskrit. As this Sâṁkhyasaptati was called Hiraṇyasaptati in Chinese and as Vindhyavâsin according to Paramârtha obtained gold (Hiraṇya or Suvarṇa) from a certain Vikramâditya it is claimed that the author, Îs'varakṛṣṇa must therefore be identified with Vindhyavâsin. This is a very fallacious argument and is against all the traditions current in India, as has been rightly pointed out by Dr. Belvalkar.[3] We do not know, and we do not see the necessity of explaining, why in Chinese the Sâṁkhyasaptati was known as the Hiraṇyasaptati.[4] But when we compare the Chinese translation with the Sâṁkhyasaptati of Îs'varakṛṣṇa we find both agree. In all probability Vindhyavâsin composed

It is quite likely that Vindhyavâsin wrote a work called Hiraṇyasaptati, but it was subsequently lost and then the two titles Hiraṇyasaptati and Sâṁkhyasaptati were confused and considered as one in the same way as Paramârthasaptati was sometimes attributed by the Chinese to Paramârtha instead of Vasubandhu the real author.

indeed certain works from which quotations are found[1] in several authoritative treatises, but the Indian authors always differentiated between Vindhyavâsin and Îs'varakṛṣṇa.[2] If the two names were identical the Indian authors, whether Hindu, Jain or Buddhist, would not have failed to notice the fact. Moreover, the guru of Vindhyavâsa according to Paramârtha was Vârṣagaṇya, who is found quoted by later writers[3], and whose name is always mentioned with great veneration. In the case of Îs'varakṛṣṇa no guru is mentioned either by him or by his commentator Mâṭharâcâryya, who merely gives the original succession of the teachers of the S'âṁkhya system, and simply says that Îs'varakṛṣṇa got this knowledge of the Sâṁkhya tenets from this chain of succession. Some[4] suspect that the last name Devala is the name of Îs'varakṛṣṇa's preceptor, but the passage in question which contains the word प्रभृतीभ्यः after Devala gives no warrant for such an opinion. From the above we can rightly disprove the theory held in certain quarters identifying Vindhyavâsin with Îs'varakṛṣṇa.

The date of Vindhyavâsin is dependent on the dates of Vasubandhu and Paramârtha. Paramârtha, as the Chinese authorities tell us, was a Brahmin of Ujjain born in A. D. 499, who, upon the invitation of the then Chinese Emperor, went to China in A. D. 546 and devoted his life to translating Sanskrit works into Chinese.[5] Paramârtha died in China at Canton in the year 569 aged 71. In his Life of Vasubandhu he says that Vasubandhu was a Mahâyânist, that students of all parts of India and neighbouring countries use his works as text books, and that he died at the age of 80, at Ayodhya. On the strength of this evidence Vasubandhu has been placed by scientific researchers between A. D. 420-500.[1] But, as Dr. Belvalkar[2] has rightly pointed out, the actual date of Vasubandhu will remain a riddle for a long time to come. The date proposed by Takakusu is untenable, as we shall show later on, and the date of Vasubandhu will have to be pushed back a century or two earlier to make room for the intermediate authors who flourished between Vasubandhu and Paramârtha.[3]

We have in the following pages discussed the date of Vasubandhu, and fixed his date approximately between A. D. 280–360. Vindhyavâsin was a contemporary of Vasubandhu's guru Buddhamitra who was defeated by the former in a discussion. Buddhamitra was therefore an older contemporary of Vasubandhu, and he may be placed 20 years before his time, namely, A. D. 260–330. Vindhyavâsin, who died immediately after his triumph, may be placed about ten years before Buddhamitra, viz. A. D. 250–320 and his guru Vṛṣagaṇa (A. D. 230–300) twenty years before Vindhyavâsin's time.

Saṅghabhadra.

Paramârtha[4] is our earliest authority on Saṅghabhadra and he informs[5] us that the latter composed two works, the Samaya of Light and the Nyâyânusâra S'âstra. The former explains the principles of the Vibhâṣâ and the latter contains refutation of the Abhidharmakoṣa of Vasubandhu. He challenged Vasubandhu to a discussion, which, according to Paramârtha, the latter refused to accept. Huien Thsang[6] further gives us the information that Vasubandhu attempted to draw him to the middle country so that the discussion may take place before eminent scholars. But eventually Saṅghabhadra died. This happened when Vasubandhu was not yet converted to the Yogâcâra school. According to the learned Dr. Takakusu he was converted to the Yogâcâra only ten years[1] before his death by his elder brother Asaṅga. Be that as it may, all our authorities on Saṅghabhadra, namely, Paramârtha, Hiuen Thsang and I-Tsing, are unanimous in saying that Saṅghabhadra was a contemporary of Asaṅga and Vasubandhu, and that he was a great Vaibhâṣika teacher. The time of Saṅghabhadra thus depends on the date of Vasubandhu, whom we have reasons for placing between A. D. 280-360. Some scholars[2] have confused this Saṅghabhadra with another Saṅghabhadra who translated a few books into Chinese in the year 489 A. D.,[3] and on that ground placed Vasubandhu between A. D. 420-500. But this cannot be correct. Vasubandhu was converted to Yogâcâra ten years before his death, which brings us down to A. D. 490; before his conversion a challenge to a discussion was given by Saṅghabhadra who spent twelve years[4] in writing his Nyâyânusâra[5] containing a refutation of Vasubandhu. In the immediately preceding period, Saṅghabhadra could have found no time to go to China, to learn Chinese and translate books into Chinese. Even if he had gone there he could not have returned before 490 A. D. and spent twelve years of study in composing his work against the Koṣa, and in challenging Vasubandhu to a discussion before the latter's conversion to Asaṅga's Yogâcâra.

It seems therefore very probable that there were two Saṅghabhadras, one a contemporary of Vasubandhu and another who went to China, learnt Chinese and translated Indian works into Chinese. Our Saṅghabhadra is a Vaibhâṣika teacher and a contemporary of Vasubandhu. Both Saṅghabhadra and Vasubandhu were old when there was a proposal for discussion and we will not be very wrong if we place the former cir. A. D. 280-350 and fix the time of his death ten years prior to that of Vasubandhu.

Vasubandhu.

A. D. 280-360

Vasubandhu comes next in chronological order.[1] He was born in Gândhâra, and a tablet to his memory was seen by Hiuen Thsang. He was a Vaibhâṣika teacher in the beginning of his career, but was subsequently converted to Yogâcâra by his illustrious brother Asaṅga, a desciple of Maitreyanâtha. He spent many years of his life in travelling, taking part in discussions and writing a large number of books, and he died at the age of eighty. He was a contemporary of the two Vaibhâṣika teachers Saṅghabhadra and Manoratha.[2]

Kumârajîva[3] wrote a Life of Vasubandhu between A. D. 401-9 and Paramârtha[4] (A. D. 499–560) wrote another subsequently. The biography of Kumârajîva was lost in 730 A. D. as Nanjio informs us. Hiuen Thsang[5] and I-Tsing[6] also compiled some information and mentioned them in their Travels. Paramârtha[7] informs us that Vasubandhu was a contemporary of Vikramâditya who is according to V. A. Smith[8] none other than Chandragupta the First of the Gupta Dynasty who reigned between cir. 320–330. Paramârtha further informs us that his preceptor was Buddhamitra who was defeated by Vindhyavâsin in a debate. The date of Vasubandhu has been differently assigned by different scholars. The two most important are those that place him between A. D. 280–360 and between A. D. 420–500. Those who desire to have full details about the discussion may refer to the masterly review of Sir V. A. Smith in the third edition of the Early History of India, page, 328 ff.

The theory placing him between A. D. 420–500 is hardly tenable, mainly on the ground that between A. D. 500 and 546, the date Paramârtha arrived in China, we have to place many an important literary man of India, such as Îs'varakṛṣṇa, who is believed to be a contemporary of Diṅnâga, Diṅnâga the father of the mediaeval Indian Logic, his disciple S'aṅkarsvâmin, Haribhadra Sûri, Mâṭhara whose commentary on the Kârikâs of Îs'varakṛṣṇa was translated into Chinese by Paramârtha, and perhaps many others.[1] Even though with difficulty we imagine that these authors flourished in the period intervening between Vasubandhu and the mission of Paramârtha, there will be hardly any time left for the compositions of these great authors to acquire fame on the soil of India before a translation may seem to be justified.

The most important argument in favour of placing Vasubandhu between A. D. 420–500 seems to be that a contemporary of his, Saṅghabhadra by name, translated two works into Chinese in the years 488 and 489 A. D.[2] But if we refer to Hiuen Thsang,[3] who recorded the intellectual fight between Saṅghabhadra and Vasubandhu, we will find that Saṅghabhadra after perusing the Abhidharmakoṣa of Vasubandhu was so much enraged that he devoted himself for twelve years in composing his Nyâyânusâra-s'âstra against the Koṣa, and when it was ready challenged Vasubandhu to a discussion. Vasubandhu tried to draw him to Maghadha with a view that the discussion might take place before a company of profoundly learned men qualified to judge the respective merits of the two opponents. Saṅghabhadra was too old at that time, and before the discussion took place died in a monastery at Matipura. Immediately before his death he sent all the MSS of his great work, accompanied with a letter, to Vasubandhu requesting him not to destroy his composition.

From this account of Hiuen Thsang it appears quite probable that the Saṅghabhadra of the Chinese translation and the Saṅghabhadra of the time of Vasubandhu are two different persons. Had Vasubandhu died in the year 500 and Saṅghabhadra ten years previous to that, after spending twelve years of arduous labour in composing his epoch-making work, how could the latter go to China in 489 and translate Sanskrit works into Chinese? Even if we assume that the same Saṅghabhadra translated a Sanskrit work into Chinsse in 489 A. D. when then did he come back to India to write his Nyâyânusâras'âstra and challenge Vasubandhu to a discussion and die in India ten years before Vasubandhu's death? Is all this possible in the brief span of eleven years? If this Saṅghabhadra, moreover, were the same man who went to China, learnt Chinese and translated Sanskrit works into Chinese why then, did Hiuen Thsang conceal the fact while giving his biography in his Travels? He was himself a learned Chinese and he would certainly have mentioned it had it been the fact. Is it too unnatural for us to expect this information from Hiuen Thsang? His silence on this point compels us to postulate two Saṅghabhadras, one a contemporary of Vasubandhu and another the translator.

If we take Vasubandhu's time with V. A. Smith and M. Peri to be between A. D. 280 and 360 there is harmony in the subsequent chronology of Indian authors. We need not in that case deny the existence of Kumârajîva's Life of Vasubandhu as a myth, and consider the Vasubandu of the Chinese list of patriarchs as different from the great Buddhist teacher Vasubandhu, and his works translated by Kumârajîva into Chinese as belonging to somebody else's. If we take the death of Aśvaghoṣa the 12th patriarch in A. D. 127 and postulate an interval of 27 years on an average between each patriarch then we come to A. D. 360 as the death of Vasubandhu according to the following computation:—

12	Aśvaghoṣa	127	A. D.
13	Kapimala	154	A. D.
14	Nâgârjuna	181	A. D.

Nanjio informs us that Kumârajîva wrote a Life of Vasubandhu which was translated into Chinese between A. D. 401–409 but was lost in A. D. 730. Paramârtha wrote another Life of the great author and translated it into Chinese between A. D. 557–569. The following thirty six works are attributed to Vasubandhu in the Chinese Tripiṭaka.[1]

Îs'varakṛṣṇa.

A. D. 340–390

Îs'varakṛṣṇa, the author of the Sâṁkhyasaptati which was commented on by Mâṭhara and Gauḍapâda and was translated into Chinese by Paramârtha, is mentioned in the Tattvasangraha.[1] There is a great controversy about his time: in one of his latest articles Dr. Belvalkar[1] has fixed his time as the first or the second half of the second century A. D. He assumes that Îs'varakṛṣṇa was earlier than Vindhyavâsin, and as such must belong to a very early period, on the authority of the following passage in the Mâṭharavṛtti[2] where the succession of Sâṁkhya teachers is mentioned :—कपिलादासुरिणा प्राप्तमिदं ज्ञानम् । ततः पञ्चशिखेन तस्माद्भार्गवोलूकवाल्मीकिहारीतदेवलप्रभृतीनाऽऽगतम् । ततस्तेभ्य ईश्वरकृष्णेन प्राप्तम् । Dr. Belvalkar[3] without any ceremony assumes that Devala is the immediate preceptor of Îs'varakṛṣṇa, disregarding the word (प्रभृति) 'and others' in the passage altogether. If Kapila is earlier than 6th century B. C. as is generally held, and Îs'varakṛṣṇa belongs to the second century A. D. with seven teachers intervening between them, we will have to assign an average life period of about 120 years to each of these teachers. This can hardly stand, and we thus see the necessity of the word (प्रभृति) after Devala in the passage above cited. Simply became Mâṭhara failed to mention Vṛṣagaṇa in the list of succession, Îs'varakṛṣṇa cannot clearly be assigned to a period anterior to him, as the word (प्रभृति) in the passage in question may very well include his name or even the name of his desciple Vindhyavâsin. On this ground alone therefore Îs'varakṛṣṇa cannot be placed so early as the second century A. D.

If we compare the French translation of the corresponding passage in Chinese, viz., "Cette connaissance vint de Kapila à Âsuri, qui la transmit à Pañcas'ikha, P. la donna à Ho-Kia, Hokia à Ulûka, Ulûka à Po-po-li, Po-po-li à Îs'varakṛṣṇa. Par cette transmission Îs'varakṛṣṇa obtint la connaissance" (Takakusu: La Sâṁkhyakârikâ, p. 147-8) we find that the Chinese words Ho-kia and Po-po-li stand respectively for Bhârgava and Vâlmîki of the Sanskrit text of the Mâṭharavṛtti. In the Chinese translation, it may be pointed out, the names of Hârita and Devala and the word प्रभृति are omitted. It is exteremely hazardous therefore to affirm that Devala or Po-po-li is the teacher of Îs'varakṛṣṇa.

Some scholars attempted to identify him with Vindhyavâsin on Chinese authority but as we have shown previously, this theory is baseless, and should forthwith be dismissed without any ceremony as an impossibility.[1]

In our opinion the date of Îs'varakṛṣṇa depends on the dates of Vâtsyâyana and Diṅnâga. Îs'varakṛṣṇa is indeed indebted to Vâtsyâyana[2] who refers to the Vijñânavâdins and S'ûnyavâdins and therefore must belong to a period after Nâgârjuna. Vâtsyâyana has been placed by eminent scholars in the same period on similar and other grounds. Îs'varakṛṣṇa's views are further referred to in the Nyâyapraves'a of Diṅnâga a disciple of Vasubandhu who flourshed between A. D. 280–360.

Diṅnâga's time may therefore be taken as 345–425. Moreover, several scholars[3] have suspected that Vindhyavâsin wilfully altered the Sâṁkhya System, or at any rate held a different view from the rest of orthodox Sâṁkhya teachers. Vindhyavâsin was attacked and abused mercilessly by Vasubandhu in his Paramârthasaptati, as we learn from Paramârtha's account of Vasubandhu.[4] This is just the time, we think, when Îśvarakṛṣṇa's Sâṁkhya-Kârikâ was called for, and accordingly he composed a treatise which represented the orthodox views of the S'aṣṭitantra as against the intentional alterations of Vindhyavâsin, and which was devoid

We find e. g. अन्तराभवदेहस्तु निषिद्धो विन्ध्यवासिना in Kumârila's S'lokavârtika p. 704, whereas Îs'varakṛṣṇa admits the existence of a subtle body between the death and the next birth—Sâṁkhyakârikâ 39–41. Further—विशेषदृष्टमेतच्च लिखितं विन्ध्यवासिना S'lokavârtika, p. 393, while Îs'varakṛṣṇa says—त्रिविधमनुमानम् Sâṁkhyakârika No. 5. Tattvasaṅgraha, p. 636—सारूप्यं विन्ध्यवासीष्टम् with reference to sound, whereas orthodox Sâṁkhya opinion is that the sound like all other entities possess the three qualities, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas.

4. Takakusu in JRAS. 1905, p. 47; "Finding however that the heretic was dead he (Vasubandhu) wrote a book called Paramârthasaptati in opposition to the new Sâṁkhyasûtra of Vindhyavâsa. The Siddhântas of the Sâṁkhya were all destroyed."

of all controversial matters, as these were considered of no value by Îśvarakṛṣṇa[1]. If this theory were correct we may reasonably expect to find Îs'varakṛṣṇa as an older contemporary of Diṅnâga[2] A support to this view comes from an unexpected quarter, a late Tibetan authority,[3] wherein we find that Îs'varakṛṣṇa played mischief with Diṅnâga when he was writing his Pramâṇasamuccaya. Diṅnâga challenged him to a controversy, either staking his own doctrine. When Diṅnâga was able to vanquish him several times, Îs'varakṛṣṇa fled, without fulfilling the conditions required by the contract, after uttering some incantations which burnt all the belongings of the Âcârya. It is quite likely therefore that Îs'varakṛṣṇa was an older contemporary of Diṅnâga and a junior contemporary of Vasubandhu, and his time may therefore tentatively be fixed as between A. D. 340–390.

Diṅnâga.

A. D. 345-425

Diṅnâga, whom Dr. Vidyabhusana justly styles as the father of Mediaeval Indian Logic, has been several times referred to in the Tattvasaṅgraha.[4] The most important service Diṅnâga did was by reducing the five members of a syllogiam, as propounded by Akṣapâda and Vâtsyâyana, to three, thereby giving it a form very similar to the Aristotelian syllogism of three members.[5] He was the first Buddhist scholar to proclaim Authority and Upamâna (Analogy) as invalid proofs. He deviated also from all definitions of perception and inference as current in his time, and gave his own definitions[1] against the views of Akṣapâda and Vâtsyâyana. Diṅnâga was the author of the Nyâyapraves'asûtra, the only available work of his in Sanskrit, which is now being printed for publication in the Gaekwad's Oriental Series. All that we know of his personal history comes from Tibetan sources, and the information we obtain from these sources may be summarised thus: Diṅnâga was born of a Brahmin family in Siṃhavaktra near Kâñchi in the Madras Presidency. He was subsequently admitted into the Buddhist Church of the Hînayâna by Nâgadatta; thereafter he became the disciple of Vasubandhu (280–360) and studied the scriptures of both Hînayâna and Mahâyâna. He was then invited to Nalanda where he defeated many Tîrthikas, and since then he was known as the Fighting Bull or a Bull in Discussion. He travelled from place to place, and was mainly engaged in defeating Tîrtha logicians and converting them to Buddhist faith.[2] His works were translated into Chinese by Paramârtha (499–569) and he is reputed to be the author of the following works on logic besides the Nyâyapraves'a already refered to.

Âcârya Sûri.

A. D. 478

In the Tattvasaṅgraha[1] mention has been made of an author who is styled Âcârya Sûri. This Âcârya seems to be no other than the celebrated Haribhadra Sûri of the Jainas. If we are correct in our surmise we have to identify him with the first Haribhadra Sûri who died in A. D. 478[2] or Samvat 535., instead of the second Haribhadra who flourished about 1120 A. D. We do not know what works were composed by the first Haribhabra, but it is certain that he was held in high esteem as a logician and contributed materially to the development of Indian Thought. It seems quite likely that he commented on Diṅnâga's Nyâyapraves'a which is being printed by the excellent Orientalist, Principal A. B. Dhruva for the Gaekwad's Oriental Series. His opinion is quoted by Kamalaśîla in the Svabhâvaparîkṣâ, and the view held by him on this subject is that this diversified Universe cannot spring up without a cause, and the very reasons added in support of this theory shows that such cannot be the case. If the theory were true it must be self-existent and no reasons are required in its support.

Mâṭharâcârya.

Mâṭhara the first commentator of the Sâṁkhyakârikâ of Îśvarakṛṣṇa is indeed not mentioned in our book either by the author or his commentator. The reason why Mâṭhara comes in here is that Kamalaśîla has taken passages[3] from Maṭhara's commentary in stating the views of the Sâṁkhya adherents.

Mâṭhara has been differently placed in different centuries by eminent scholars:—

1. He is placed in the first century A. D. and identified with Mâṭhara the minister, a contemporary of Caraka and Aśvaghoṣa all of whom belonged to the court of Kaniska (A. D. 78–120)[1].

2. Those who place him later than the 8th century say that Mâṭhara has quoted from Hastâmalaka and Bhâgavata which are decidedly later works[2].

3. He is placed before Paramârtha as it is supposed that Paramârtha translated his Vṛtti into Chinese.[3]

Mâṭhara cannot be placed so early as the first century A. D., as we have reasons to suppose that Îśvarakṛṣṇa was not earlier than Vâtsyâyana,[4] who is placed in the third century on reliable grounds. Moreover, Mâṭhara, who refers to and virtually quotes Diṅnâga's Nyâyapraves'a and mentions his three-limbed syllogism,[5] cannot reasonably be earlier than the 5th century A. D.

The theory that Mâṭhara belonged to a period later than the 8th century may be forthwith rejected on the ground of Kamalaśîla's quotation from it. Moreover, Paramârtha translated this very book into Chinese in the 6th century, though we have grave reasons to suppose that the printed edition of the Mâṭharavṛtti is not exactly the original work as composed by Mâṭhara but contains many spurious matters. As a result of that quotations from later works such as the Bhâgavata or the Hastâmalaka have been smuggled into the work which is printed.

The correct date of the Vṛtti of Mâṭhara seems to be cir. 500 and Mâṭhara most likely flourished before Paramârtha who translated his work into Chinese, and after Diṅnâga whom he quotes or to whom he is indebted.

We have compared portions of the printed Vṛtti with the French translation of the work as published by Dr. Takakusu. The opening conversation in the work between Kapila and Âsuri, which is not to be found in the Gauḍapâda Bhâṣya, is so remarkable that we cannot assume a chance connection between the two. The succession of the Sâṁkhya teachers (completely omitted in the Gauḍapâda Bhâṣya) at the end of the Vṛtti and its translation differ a little, yet mainly the two appear to be the same.[1] It must however be pointed out that the Sanskrit version contains many more matters than are contained in the translation of Paramârtha, and the manner in which these new matters are incorporated forcibly brings it to our mind that they are nothing but interpolations made by some later Sâṁkhya scholiast. Similarly, it is very doubtful whether the present Chinese translation of the Vṛtti represent really a faithful copy of the translation as made by Paramârtha. It is quite likely that this translation omits many things which were unintelligible to the copyists of the Chinese translations. As a result we find therein the names of Hârita, Devala, etc. omitted in the succession list of Sâṁkhya teachers.

Uddyotakara.

Udyotakara's opinions are very frequently referred to by S'ântarakṣita, and these are quoted and criticised in the Tattvasaṅgraha times without number. From the subjoined summary of the Tattvasaṅgraha his opinions can very easily be collected, and it will also be evident in what a masterly way S'ântarakṣita was able to refute his arguments. The way in which our author deals with the views of Uddyotakara and Kumârila makes us confident that the Tattvasaṅgraha was written specially to refute their doctrines and defend Buddhism against their attacks.

Uddyotakara is the next famous Nyâya philosopher after Vâtsyâyana, and is the author of Nyâyavârtika. This is a commentary on the Bhâṣya by Vâtsyâyana on the Nyâyasûtras of Akṣapâda. There is a good deal of controversy about his date. Writing in Samvat. 898 Vacaspati Miśra says in his Tâtparyaṭîkâ that Uddyotakara wrote the Vârttika in order to clear up the truth which was obscured by the false reasonings of Diṅnâga etc.[1] According to Dr. Vidyabhushana[2] he criticised also the doctrines of Nâgârjuna and Vasubandhu. This shows that Uddyotakara flourished after Diṅnâga whose doctrines he criticised without however mentioning his name. Uddyotakara is mentioned in the Vâsavadattâ[3] a book referred to in the Harṣacarita[4] of Bâṇa who was a contemporary of king S'rî Harṣa (606-647 A. D.). In some quarters Uddyotakara is regarded as a contemporary of Dharmakîrti because Uddyotakara referred to a work called Vâdavidhi[6] which is only another name for Vâdanyâya of Dharmakîrti. But we must not forget that Vasubandhu was also an author of three logical works called in Chinese Ron-ki (Vâdavidhi), Ron-shi-ki (Vâdamârga) and Ron-shin (Vâdakaus'ala).[7] These three works were seen by Hiuen Thsang and even in his time the authorship of these works was attributed to Vasubandhu. Uddyotakara's Vâdavidhi therefore may very well represent the Vâdavidhi of Vasubandhu and not the Vâdanyâya of Dharmakîrti. If we regard Dharmakîrti and Uddyotakara as contemporaries, we are unable to explain the mention of Uddyotakara in the Vâsavadattâ which is referred to in the Harṣacarita. We should also remember that Dharmakîrti as a scholar was not mentioned by Hiuen Thsang though both were studying at the same time in the same Nalanda monastery. It is therefore probable that Uddyotakara flourished considerably before the time of Dharmakîrti, and that the latest date that can be assigned to him is 600 A. D. Nothing is known of the personal history of Uddyotakara, except that he belonged to the Bhâradvâja Gotra and was a preceptor of the Pâs'upata S'aiva sect.[1] Dr. Vidyâbhusana is inclined to think that he was a native of Thânes'vara which was connected with Srughna by a broad road, as a reference[2] to this is found in his work.

Bhâmaha.

A. D. 580–640

Several verses of Bhâmaha are quoted by S'ântarakṣita in his Tattvasaṅgraha, though he does not mention his name. His commentator Kamalas'îla supplies the name of Bhâmaha, and the verses can be traced in the Kâvyâlaṅkâra of Bhâmaha.[3] Bhâmaha therefore must have flourished before S'ântarakṣita, and the latest date that can be assigned to him is A. D. 700. Bhâmaha can however be placed before Dharmakîrti, because in his definition of perception, though Bhâmaha quotes Diṅnâga[4] yet he does not refer to Dharmakîrti, whose definition of perception seems to have met with general acceptance or criticism by all logicians after him. Bhâmaha may therefore be assigned to a period previous to Dharmakîrti.

Bhâmaha is mentioned in the Apohaparîkṣâ, and his opinions with regard to the question of Apoha may be stated as follows. The words cow, etc. mean the objects cow, etc. and not the negation of the opposite. If it were so, there is the necessity of other words to represent the objects, cows, etc., because one word cannot possibly produce two different cognitions, namely of the object and of the negation of its opposite. Hence Apoha cannot be the meaning of the word.

Dharmakîrti.

Dharmakîrti is mentioned several times in the Tattvasaṅgraha[1], and his views on perception and inference are specially referred to. All that we know of his personal history comes from Tibetan sources, especially from the accounts of Lâmâ Târânâth. According to this authority he was born in the South in the kingdom of Cûḍâmaṇi which he identified with Trimalaya. Dharmakîrti was a Brahmin by birth but was soon converted to Buddhism. Later on he came to Nalanda at a time when Dharmapâla was the chief of the monastery.[2] Though some of the Tibetan authorities maintain that he was a nephew of Kumârila, which statement is not endorsed by all, they all agree nevertheless in saying that these two authors were contemporaries. Stories are recorded of controversies between these two great scholiasts, and it is said that Kumârila, late in life, was converted to Buddhism along with his 500 followers by Dharmakîrti.[3] Hiuen Thsang does not mention Dharmakîrti, though he was a pupil of Dharmapâla, who retired in 635 A. D. when S'îlabhadra the teacher of Hiuen Thsang succeeded him. I-Tsing who travelled through India during 670–695 on the other hand mentions Dharmkîrti.[1] It appears therefore probable that he flourished in the period between 600–650. He was a contemporary of the famous Tibetan king Sron san gam po (620–698), and as such must have belonged to the first half of the 7th century.[2] It is maintained in certain quarters that the famous Naiyâyika philosopher Uddyotakara was his contemporary, and that both of them quoted each other.[3] But this theory is hardly tenable as it gives rise to a serious chronological inconsistency. Dharmakîrti's time is settled beyond doubt by I-Tsing's mention of his name and by his designating him as belonging to the later years along with Dharmapâla and others. Uddyotakara on the other hand is mentioned in a very early work, namely the Vâsavadattâ which is referred to by Bâṇa a contemporary of Dharmakîrti. How then Dharmakîrti and Uddyotakara can be contemporaries ?

Dhrmakîrti is known in China as the author or revisor of the well known Mahâyâna work entitled the Vajrasûcî, the authorship of which is generally attributed to Aśvaghoṣa. This work as revised by Dharmakîrti was translated into Chinese between A. D. 973–981.[4]

Dr. S. C. Vidyabhusana[5] on the strength of Tibetan translations has shown that Dharamkîrti was a great writer and that the following works of his are extant in Tibetan translations. :—

Bhartṛhari.

A. D. 600–650

In the Anumânaparikṣâ[1] S'ântarakṣita refers to the opinion of Bhartṛhari who is also quoted by Kumârila[2] and referred to by I-Tsing.[3] According to I-Tsing Bhartṛhari is the author of the Bhartṛhari S'astra which is a commentary on the Cûrṇi, the Vâkya discourse or the Vâkyapadîya and the Pei-na or the Beḍâvṛtti, which is a commentary on the Kârikâs of Dharmapâla. The testimony of I-Tsing, viz. that Bhartṛhari died forty years before the composition of his Record, settles his date beyond doubt: he must have flourished in a period between A. D. 600 and 650. According to I-Tsing Bhartṛhari was a believer in the Three Jewels and diligently meditated on the S'unyatâ, and a story is told that he entered the monastic order seven times but being unable to free himself from worldly desires he returned seven times to the laity. His opinion recorded in the Tattvasaṅgraha is that only by reason of the invariable concomittance of the middle term with the major term the inference cannot be valid because the powers of both vary according to time and place.

Bâṇa.

A. D. 600–650

The reason why Bâṇa is mentioned here, even though he is not referred to by name either by S'ântarakṣita or Kamalas'îla, is that a stanza from his Kâdambari is quoted[4] by Kamalaśîla. Bâṇa being a contemporary of king Harṣavardhana of Thâneśvara must have lived in a period between 600 and 650. Bâṇa is, of course, not a logician and as such none of his views are mentioned in the Tattvasaṅgraha.

Kumârila Bhaṭṭa.

A. D. 620–680

Kumârila is very frequently criticised by our author, and it seems probable that the Tattvasaṅgraha was written mainly to refute the arguments and theories of Kumârila and Uddyotakara, the two deadliest antagonists of Buddhism in those days. The real name of Kumârila, according to a Tibetan authority, is Kumâralîla but he was called Kumârila by the common people.[1] Kumârila is reputed to be the author of a number of important works on the Mîmâṃsâ system of philosophy. He composed an independent exposition of the S'abara Bhâṣya in three parts known as S'lokavârtika, Tantravârtika and Tupṭîkâ. Nothing is known definitely about his time, and there is a good deal of controversy with regard to the period in which he flourished. Dr. Das Gupta considers him as a senior contemporary of S'aṅkara and places him in 788 A. D.,[2] or in other words, some fifty years after the composition of Tattvasaṅgraha of S'ântarakṣita, but as S'ântarakṣita is full of Kumârila Dr. Das Gupta's theory is untenable. It is certain that Kumârila was earlier than S'ântarakṣita, and that the latest date that can be assigned to him is cir 700 A. D. allowing about thirty-five years' time for Kumârila's works to obtain sufficient fame and authority to justify criticism from S'ântarakṣita. Further, from the Tibetan sources we get the information that Kumârila was a contemporary of Dharmakîrti, whom we placed between 600 and 650 A. D.[3] The testimony of Sucarita Miśra, the author of a commentary entitled Kâs'ikâ on the S'lokavârtika, leads us to infer that Kumârila criticised the views of Dharmakîrti.[4] Bhavabhûti or Ubbeyaka mentioned in the Tattvasaṅgraha was a direct desciple of Kumârila[5]. Both Kumârila and Bhavabhûti must have been very long-lived persons, as all Mîmâṁsakas leading a active and healthy life ought to be. We find mention of Bhavabhûti in the Gauḍavaho[6] of Vâkpatirâja a contemporary of king Yas'ovarman. Yas'ovarman belongs to the first half of the eighth century, as he was contemporaneous with Lalitâditya of Kashmir.[7] It is reasonable to suppose that Bhavabhûti was living up till at least 725 A. D. Kumârila who was a contemporary of both Dharmakîrti and Bhavabhûti therefore must belong to a period between 620 and 680 A. D. and Bhavabhûti being his direct disciple, in all probability, flourished in 655–725 A. D. Simply because Kumârila criticised Bhartṛhari, whose death took place some forty years before I-Tsing's record, namely in 650 A. D., Kumârila's time cannot be placed so late as the first half of the 8th century, as some of the scholars are inclined to believe.[1] According to our calculation Kumârila must have lived 30 years after Bhartṛhari's death, and hence his criticisms of the latter's views can very well be explained. If we take him to the first half of the 8th century there will be hardly any room for Bhavabhûti, his disciple, who is referred to in the Tattvasaṅgraha by the name of Ubeyaka.[2]

S'ubhagupta.

Bhadanta S'ubhagupta's views are mentioned[3] several times in the Tattvasaṅgraha, both by S'ântarakṣita and his commentator Kamalaśîla. Haribhadra Sûri II in his Anekântajaya-patâkâṭîkâ also mentioned his name and criticised his views, and called him 'a follower of the Vârttika.[4]' Dr. Vidyabhusana[5] identified him with S'ubhâkara Gupta a contemporary of Râmapâla who ascended the throne about 1080 A. D. On this ground he assigned S'ubhagupta to the end of the 11th century. Frequent mention of S'ubhagupta in the Tattvasaṅgraha makes Dr. Vidyabhusana's theory untenable. S'ubhagupta and S'ubhâkaragupta must be two different persons, and it is doubtful whether S'ubhâkara

Gupta[1] ever wrote any work on logic. Haribhadra Suri II must therefore have referred to S'ubhagupta, and it is not correct to say that S'ubhâkara Gupta wrote a work on logic wherein he closely followed Dharmakîrti, merely on the strength of the quotation of Haribhadra Suri proviously referred to. On the strength of this quotation, on the other hand, S'ubhagupta should be placed after Dharmakîrti and before A. D. 700, and his date therefore may pretty accurately be settled at 650–700 A. D. In the Bahirartha-parîkṣâ, Bhadanta S'ubhagupta's opinion is that the outward objects are nothing but crowds of atoms, but they are not cognized as mere atoms because the atoms always combine themselves in crowds. The cognition of an object as one and non-atomic is wrong. He also held that even though the Vijñânas are devoid of the forms of the outward objects, they can indeed reflect them, as the Vijñânas are nothing but the cognition of outward objects. He further held that the objective world can be proved by perception as well as by inference because in our daily life we are always perceiving the objects. The object must be existing because we are constantly obtaining the expected effects from these objects.

Purandara.

A. D. 700

A Cârvâka author by name Purandara[2] is referred to in the Pañjikâ of Kamalaśîla, and his views also are refuted in the Kârikâs of S'ântarakṣita. We have not come across any reference to this author as a Lokâyata anywhere in Sanskrit literature, but from the mention of his name by Kamalaśîla the latest date that can be assigned to him is A. D. 700. He may in fact be considerably older, because in the centuries after Christ we meet with no names of Lokâyata philosophers, though the system must have been in existence even so late as the time of Mâdhavâcâryya, Guṇaratna, etc. who have criticised their theories in their works. His view is that the Cârvâkas also are prepared to accept inference as a means of right knowledge as it is useful in our daily life. But the mechanical form of inference as proposed by the Buddhists and others can by no means be considered a medium of right knowledge, as it is thoroughly impracticable for daily use.

Yogasena.

A. D. 700

One Bhadanta Yogasena's views[1] are criticised in the Tattvasaṅgraha in connection with the examination of the doctrine of permanent entities. The word Bhadanta is always used in the Tattvasaṅgraha to denote a Buddhist, or more properly a Hînayâna Buddhist. Our authors have not made a confusion in this respect, anywhere in this book, and on this ground we can take Yogasena to be a Buddhist. But he held a view which went directly against the doctrine of momentariness, the chief corner-stone on which Buddhism is based. If we are correct in our surmise and if Yogasena be really a Buddhist, then we see that even amongst the Buddhists also there was a line of thought which was diametrically opposed to the teachings of Buddha. Nothing definite is known about Yogasena; he is not mentioned in Nanjio's Catalogue of the Chinese Tripiṭaka nor in any of the Tibetan catalogues. All that we can say with the present materials at our disposal is that Yogasena flourished before S'ântarakṣita, and the latest date that can be assigned to him is cir. 700.

Yogasena held the view that if the entities be considered momentary they can neither produce effects in succession nor at the same time. If the momentary entities are capable of producing effects themselves then there is no necessity of assisting conditions. If it is otherwise, how can the assisting conditions and the material cause (both being momentary) produce the effect without producing some particular change on one another? So the entities must be held as permanent and not momentary.

Sâmaṭa and Yajñaṭa.

A. D. 700

In the Sarvajñaparîkṣâ the names of two Mîmâṁsâ philosophers, S'amaṭa and Yajñaṭa[1] are mentioned in the same breath in the Tattvasaṅgraha, because they held identical views. S'ântarakṣiṭa does not mention their names, but gives their views elaborately, and their names appear in the commentary. Both these authors are unknown in Sanskrit literature, and all we can say now is that they flourished about 700 A. D., probably after Kumârila, who does not mention them.

They held that the omniscience of the Buddha cannot be established, on the ground that his Vijñana cannot cognize all the different things simultaneonsly because he has not many Vijñanas. If the Sarvajña has one Vijñâna in that case he cannot know such contradictory ideas as purity and impurity at the same time. Moreover, when the Sarvajña enters Samâdhi his knowledge does not originate either thorough perception or inference. If there is a third proof then it is certainly not knowledge, because the latter has but two mediums. So, to know Dharma we should go to the words which are not uttered by human beings, because human beings cannot be omniscient.

Aviddhakarṇa.

Aviddhakarṇa is a Naiyâyika author whose views S'ântarakṣita refers to in his work on several occasions[2]. He seems to have been a Naiyâyika of great repute and authority, but nothing is known about him from Hindu or Buddhist sources up to now. In several examinations S'ântarakṣita quotes his opinions and generally places his opinions first before Praśastamati and Uddyotakara. It is quite likely therefore that Aviddhakarṇa was earlier than these two, but with the present materials in hand we cannot say anything definite about his time except to assert that he wa earlier than A. D. 700. Kamalas'îla further gives us the informa tion that Aviddhakarṇa wrote a work entitled Tattvaṭîkâ wher he refuted the doctrines of the Cârvâkas.[1]

For the establishment of the doctrine of Monistic God h held that the universe, being an Avayavî, must be handled by a intelligent creator: the Aṇus, on the other hand, having no Avayav cannot be handled by anybody. The Aṇus of the elements ar able to produce effects only when handled by God, because th effect has a form, just as threads etc. produce cloth only whe handled by the weaver. On the question of Âtman Aviddha karṇa held that it should be eternal and omnipresent, an things which are able to produce the feelings of pleasure and pai to one Âtman should have some connection with the eternal Âtma also. Aviddhakarṇa's opinion about the doctrine of momentarines was hostile to the Buddhists. He held that there are two kind of existences, eternal and transitory. The transitory things ar destroyed whenever the cause of destruction is acting. Thing are not always destroyed without the cause of destruction bein present, because destruction appears only occasionally and no always. His opinion on the notion of substance was that th Aṇus of elements have no cause, as there is no ground to prov it, just as an ass-horn does not exist. Aviddhakarṇa further held that unity should be taken as a separate quality, because the seeds, water and earth, which produce the seedling cannot do so separately without union. Number according to him is also a separate quality, because the objects like elephants etc. are known as one, two or three which are different from the knowledge of the elephants.

S'aṅkarasvâmin.

Another Naiyâyika author whose views are referred to by our author[2] is S'aṅkarasvâmin. He is to be distinguished from the Buddhist logician of the same name who was a disciple of Diṅnâga and a commentator on his works. The name of S'aṅkarasvâmin is long unknown, and about his date we have not the least idea. All that we can say is that he flourished before S'âṅtarakṣita and that the latest date that can be assigned to him is cir. 700 A. D. It is quite possible also that he was earlier than Uddyotakara whose famous work might have stamped his works out of existence.

S'aṅkarasvâmin supported the Naiyâyika theory of Âtman on the ground that the desires etc, must depend on something, because they are products, just as the colour etc. depend on some entity. The cause of these desires is the Âtman. His idea of perception is worth noting. He held that the feelings of pleasure etc. are not cognitions. The feeling of pleasure and the cognition of happiness, however, remain in the same place. The perception of pleasure is caused by the mind which is one of the sense-organs.

Pras'astamati.

A. D. 700

S'âṅtarakṣita[1] refers to the opinions held by another Naiyâyika scholar who is called Praśastamati. This author seems to be different from the Vaiśeṣika philosopher Praśastapâda. Like his compeer Aviddhakarṇa we have no information about him, his doctrines, opinions and his time. All that we can hazard to say is that he flourished before S'âṅtarakṣita, and the latest date that can be assigned to him is cir. 700 A. D.

Some of the views held by this scholar are as follows. He supported the doctrine of God as an intelligent creator of the universe on the ground that the people in the beginning of creation must be dependent on somebody for instruction on Vyavahâra or conventionalities because they are the same and fixed everywhere, just as a child is dependent on the elders for instruction on language, etc. That somebody in the beginning of creation is God. God should be omniscient also, because the doer always knows the cause of his actions. The theory of inherence as held by Praśastamati is rather interesting: he held that though the inherent connection between the substance and the quality is one and eternal, it will not be felt in the same way in all substances with other qualities, because substances have the power only to represent their own specific qualities.

Bhâvivikta.

Another Naiyâyika author referred to by S'ântarakṣita is Bhâvivikta, who was long unknown in Sanskrit literature. His opinions are several times quoted, referred to and refuted in the Tattvasaṅgraha[1]. Nothing can be said definitely about his time except that he was earlier than our author and that the latest date that can be assigned to him is cir. 700 A. D. But it is quite likely that he flourished before Uddyotakara and it was probably owing to his great popularity that the works of Praśastamati, Avidhhakarṇa and Bhâvivikta were lost, and their views forgotten. In that case we see the importance of S'ântarakṣita and Kamalaśîla in preserving their names and views.

Bhâvivikta was antagonistic to the Buddhist doctrine of momentariness, and formulated that things cannot be called momentary because they are entities and objects of knowledge. The Vijñâna in which the sun, moon, etc. reflect feels only the objects of that moment, but in reality the objects are always existent. Bhâvivikta also had definite opinion about the notion of substance. He held that the things we perceive are not merely conglomerations of component atoms because the things are perceived while the atoms are not. The constituent parts and the whole formed by them are quite different because they have different powers, different effects and differnt creators. On the notion of generality Bhâvivikta held that its existence can be proved by perception when we feel the entities as existing, with the substance, quality, etc. Generality is also proved by inference.

Vijñâna of the substance, for instance, must be caused by a special thing, because this Vijñâna feels the difference of one from the other knowledges of the same thing.

Pâtrasvâmin.

A. D. 700

In the Anumânaparîkṣâ S'ântarakṣita states the views of one Pâtrasvâmin,[1] who like many others is unknown unless indeed he be identified with the famous Jain logicion Pâtrakeśarisvâmin alias Vidyânanda, the author of the Aṣṭasâhasrî and a philosopher who flourished in the beginning of the ninth century.[2] But as S'ântarakṣita belonged to the eighth century this identification is not possible. It may further be pointed out that Vidyânada has actually quoted a verse from the Tattvasaṅgraha.[3] But from the manner in which S'ântarakṣita quotes others without mentioning their names it is quite probable that S'ântarakṣita and Vidyânanda both quoted the same verse from some earlier work which must have been written by Pâtrasvâmin. In that case Pâtrasvâmin must be an earlier author than both S'ântarakṣita and Vidyânanda, and he must have first propounded the theory that valid reason is that the existence of which cannot be maintained unless it is invariably concommittant with the major term. The reason or the middle term does not possess the three qualities, as held by others, but it has only one quality, namely the one given above. This theory of Pâtrasavâmin was a common property of all Jaina logicians of later times. About his time we have not the least idea and all that we can say now is that he was earlier than S'ântarakṣita and that the latest date that can be assigned to him is cir. 700 A. D.

Ahrîka.

A. D. 700

Another Jaina logician by name Ahrîka is referred to in the Tattvasaṅgraha[1] and his views are criticised by Kamalaśîla. S'ântarakṣita does not mention him, nor is he known in the Jaina literature. Ahrîka may be the nickname of some important Jaina logician because no one would care to bear such an ugly name as Ahrîka 'shameless', but it is imposible now to identify him with any other Jaina author. On the strength of Kamalaśîla's reference to him he may be placed about 700 A. D. though he may quite conceivably be considerably older. His view on Syâdvâda is that every entity is possessed of two qualities, general and special. The first gives rise to the cognition of it as an entity and the second to the cognition of its special characteristics. A pot, for instance, is an entity as all other things are, but it is different also from all other things by its special characteristics.

Sumati.

A. D. 670–720.

A Jaina Digambara logician by name Sumati is referred to in the Tattvasaṅgraha[2] and his opinions are quoted and criticised by Kamalaśîla. No Jaina logician of the name of Sumati is known. His time may be assigned to 700 A. D. but as he is, in the Tattvasaṅgraha, represented as criticising the views of Kumârila[3] he may be a trifle older. But the materials at present available do not permit us to place him earlier than Kumârila. His time may therefore be fixed at 670–720 with some degree of confidence. An entity, he affirmed, may be one, but it may have two qualities, general and special. By one of the two qualities it does not differ from other things while by the other it becomes different from all other things. He further held that the general quality of things only is known in everyday life. Hence the objects are cognized as one and non-atomic. The special quality of the atoms can however be perceived only by the emancipated.

Ubeyaka.

A. D. 655–725

In the Sarvajñapariksâ one Ubeyaka is mentioned and his theories refuted by Kamalaśîla.[1] In a MS noticed by S. P. Pandit in his introduction to the edition of Gauḍavaho[2] in the Bombay Sanskrit Series, Umbeka is given as a different name of Bhavabhûti, who is styled therein a direct disciple of Kumârila Bhaṭṭa. In the Citsukhi[3] also Ubeyaka is identified with Bhavabhûti. Ubeyaka mentioned in the Tattvasaṅgraha is a Mimâmsâ philosopher, and is stated as the commentator of S'lokavârtika of Kumârila.[4] Bhavabhûti or Ubeyaka also was a great Mîmâmsâ philosopher as he had written an elaborate commentary on the S'lokavârttika of Kumârila. The identification of Bhavabhûti with Umbeka, Ubbeka, or Ubeyaka, is therefore certain, and it is also certain that Kumârila was the preceptor of Bhavabhûti alias Ubeyaka. Kamalas'îla's mention of his views makes Bhavabhûti earlier than 735 A. D. Kalhana's mention of him along with the king Yaśovarman and Vâkpatirâja makes all of them contemporaries of Lalitâditya, the Kashmir king whose reign extended from 693 to 729 A. D. The evidence of the MS noticed by S. P. Pandit makes him a disciple of Kumârila whom we have good reasons to place between 620–680 A. D. We shall therefore be justified in placing Ubeyaka in a period between 655 and 725. This date seems quite likely because Umbeka commented on Maṇḍana's Bhâvanâviveka.[5] Maṇḍana in his turn quoted Prabhâkara who seems to be a disciple of Kumârila.[6] This proves that Umbeka was very young when he was admitted as a disciple of Kumarila while Maṇḍana and Prabhâkara were quite old, and Kumârila must have died a few years after Bhavabhûti accepted him as his preceptor.

In the Tattvasaṅgraha Ubeyaka is represented as refuting a view on the validity of knowledge probably as started by Prabhâkara[1]. Validity of knowledge according to the latter is nothing else than the nature of the knowledge itself. That validity is not dependent on the purity of the sense-organs because in the case of invalid knowledges also though there is no purity of sense-organs there are the forms of knowledge. Ubeyaka refutes this view by holding that the validity of knowledge is not merely a form of knowledge, but a knowledge should be considered as valid only then when it does not mistake the entity as it is. The knowledge of Sûkti as silver is invalid because this is an erroneous knowledge. That validity is not dependent on anything else than the causes of the Vijñâna. So it is said that the validity of the Vijñâna is dependent only on the Vijñâna, or in other words, is produced by the cause of the Vijñâna. Purity of the sense-organs, which is held by some as the cause of the validity of knowledge, is none other than the forms of the sense-organs which are the causes of the Vijñâna, while the impurity of the sense-organs is the cause of invalid knowledge. So it is said that the invalidity of the knowledge is produced by some other cause than the cause by which knowledge is produced. Ubeyaka refutes an anticipated objection by saying that it is absurd to think that the sense-organs are always capable of producing invalid knowledge only, but their purity alone gives rise to the validity of knowledge, because the causes of Vijñâna are always found producing valid Vijñânas in inference which is also an accepted fact in Buddhism when it is held that a valid inference is produced by the reason which is endowed with threefold qualities. The invalid knowledge therefore is not the product of the sense-organs but of their impurity alone.[1]

§ 9. SUMMARY OF CONTENTS.

I. Prakṛtiparîkṣâ.

Examination of Nature.

The Sâṅkhyas hold that from the Primordial Matter the Universe is produced. For this they establish the theory of existent effect in the cause (Satkâryavâda) and adduce the following reasons in its support:—

1. All effects must be existent in the cause before production, because otherwise the cause will not be able to produce an effect which has no connection with it. Fixed causes only are able to produce fixed effects. If the effect is not existent in the cause every cause will produce every result. The cause cannot produce an effect which does not exist anywhere. The seeds, etc., can be causes only when they have connection with an effect. The lotus in the sky which has no connection with anything cannot be the cause of an effect.

2. So all this diversified Universe having such feelings as Prasâda, Tâpa and Dainya, leads us to infer its cause in the Prakṛti or Primordial Matter endowed with the three qualities, Sattva Rajas and Tamas, because the cause and its effect are always of a similar nature.

Refutation.

1. The theory of existent effect in the cause cannot be proved, because if the effect is already existing in the cause there is no necessity of production, just as Prakṛti is not produced by any cause. As all effects are already existing in the cause before production, neither of them can be called as cause or an effect. The effects which are non-existent before production can be produced by the cause which has the power to produce such an effect, but the lotus of the sky, which is a non-entity, cannot produce an effect. Every effect cannot be produced by every cause, because some definite cause has the power to produce some definite result.

2. As there is no similarity and connection between the cause and effect in many instances (for example, the feelings of both pleasure and pain are produced by sound in different minds) the Universe having Prasâda, Tâpa and Dainya, cannot lead us to infer the Prakṛti endowed with the three qualities, as the cause of it. Further, the similarity of cause and effect cannot be proved, because the Primordial Matter—the cause of the Universe—is one and enternal whereas the effects produced by it are many and non-eternal. Therefore, as an effect can be produced by its own cause which has the power to produce such an effect, there is no necessity to infer the Primordial Matter as the cause of the Universe.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

II. Îs'varaparîkṣâ.

Examination of God.

The Naiyâyikas hold that the Universe cannot be caused only by lifeless matter unless it is handled by one intelligent creator who is eternal.

1. The Universe should be the product of an intelligent God, because it is an Avayavî (whole) and because it has the Avayavas (constituent parts) as the cause. Aviddhakarṇa.

2. The causes of the body, etc. namely the atoms of elements, are able to produce an effect which has a form only when handled by God. Aviddhakarṇa.

3. The atoms and the result of acts done in previous births combined together produce the effects, and in so doing they depend on the intelligence of God. Uddyotakara.

4. People in the beginning of creation are dependent on God for instruction on conventionalities because they are the same and fixed everywhere. Pras'astamati.

5. The elements being lifeless cannot produce the feelings of pleasure, pain etc. unless they are handled by God. Uddyotakara.

6. God must be omniscient, as the doer always perceives the causes of his actions. The Universe being an object must be perceived by somebody, and that somebody is God. Pras'astamati.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Refutation.

1. Things really are not caused by their Avayavas (constituents) and there is really no Avayavî (whole) which are the reasons to establish God. (Vide Dravyaparîkṣâ).

2. As the bodies, etc. are not Avayavîs (whole) there is no necessity to formulate an eternal and one God who will combine the constituents (Avayavas).

3. Even if we admit the whole and the members of the whole, in that case only some intellgent and unknown persons can be inferred as creators on the strength of the reasons adduced, but not an eternal or one God. If only this is wanted to be established then there is no disagreement between us, because we also admit persons as creators of the Universe according to their good and bad actions done in previous births. The inference is therefore irresistible that the Universe is not the production of one and an eternal being because it is produced by degrees and by the process of evolution, and not simultaneously.

4. We do not accept that the souls remain without consciousness in the time of Pralaya or the destruction of the world, as others do. But we hold that the chain of consciousness remains, not only at the time of the destruction, but also after it, either in the upper heavens or in the lower regions in accordance with its good or bad acts, with the same conformations, memory etc, and therefore in the beginning of creation it does not require the help of God for instruction on conventionalities. That God also cannot be the instructor, as he is formless and as he refrains from doing any good or bad actions which will result in a body.

5. God cannot be the cause of the Universe, because he himself is not created just as the lotus of the sky cannot be the cause of anything.

6. As God is not the creator he cannot be omniscient, as his omniscience was established on the strength of his being the creator, one and eternal.

III. Ubhayaparîkṣâ.

Examination of the Dualistic Philosophy of God and Matter.

The Ses'vara Sâṅkhyas believe that both God and the Primordial Matter are the causes of the Universe.

1 Matter being lifeless, cannot alone be the cause of the Universe, as also God alone cannot produce anything without the help of Matter.

2. Matter is endowed with three qualities, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas, and when God seeks its help he imbibes the three qualities from it one after the other. By the quality of Rajas he creates, by the quality of Sattva he protects, and by the quality of Tamas he destroys.

Refutation.

1. This Dualistic philosophy cannot stand to reason, because the combination of Matter and Spirit must either produce a new result on each other, or a common effect, namely, the Universe. The first is not the case, because both being eternal should remain unchanged after combination. The second also cannot be admitted, because when both are combined and both are able to produce, everything would be produced all at once, and not by degrees or by the process of evolution.

2. If Matter and Spirit combine together, why should the latter imbibe the qualities of the former one after another? Is there any third cause by which the qualities are imbibed by the Spirit one after another? If not, the Spirit must imbibe the three qualities all at once, and carry on the process of creation, protection and destruction at the same moment: because Spirit and Matter—the two causes of the Universe—are combined and there is no third cause.

IV. Svabhâvaparîkṣâ.

Examination of the theory of self-existence.

The effects are self-existent and are produced neither by different things as causes nor by themselves for no cause can be found for the filament of the lotus or the eye-like marks on the peacock's tail (Mayûracandraka). If it cannot be found it certainly does not exist. Such is the case with this diversified Universe. Similarly, the feelings like pleasure, pain etc., have no causes, because they appear only at times.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Refutation.

The filaments of the lotus, etc. have the seed, mud and water as the causes. Why then should we search for other causes which are not to be found? If all things are self-existent why should they appear at times and at different places. It is clear therefore that they should have similar things as causes and nothing else. We cannot decide that all effects are self-existent because their causes are not seen. The reasons adduced in support of the theory of self-existence themselves prove that causes are required to produce an effect, otherwise reasons will not be required to establish this theory which is always self-existent.

V. S'abdabrahmaparîkṣâ.

Examination of the theory of Word-spirit.

The Grammarians hold that there is nothing in this world except the Word-spirit.

1. There is only one eternal thing in this world and that is the Word. All visible objects are only the manifestations of this Word-spirit, and they have no real existence.

2. This one and eternal Sound also is understood through ignorance as manifesting itself into many objective forms endowed with colours, such as, white, yellow etc. They are not really different from Sound.

3. The ascetic who is emancipated and is endowed with right knowledge is able to discover that there is nothing real except the Word-spirit.

Refutation.

1. This theory is untenable because if the word-spirit leaving his own form takes the forms of other objects it cannot be termed eternal. If with its own form it manifests itself in the forms of other objects, then there will not be a deaf man, because the objects which are seen by him are nothing but the manifestations of sound.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

2. There is no necessity to postulate a real form of sound in the objects endowed with colours, like blue or yellow, though it is not seen in those things except their blue or yellow forms. This theory holding all objects as endowed with the form of the word-spirit cannot be proved, as it cannot be established either by preception or by inference.

3. According to this theory there is nothing real except the word-spirit. But wherefrom comes the emancipated ascetic? Is he different from this word-spirit or is he the same? It cannot be explained. Further, it is necessary to explain the origin of ignorance. Is it a different thing from the word-spirit? If so, what is the relation between this word-spirit and ignorance? Is ignorance eternal or non-eternal? If eternal, emancipation cannot be explained; if not, what is its cause? So this theory is untenable.

VI Puruṣaparîkṣâ.

Examination of the Doctrine of Anthropomorphic God.

This discussion refers to the conception of Puruṣa in the Saṃhitâs and Brâhmaṇas.

1. Puruṣa alone creates the Universe. He is the cause of creation, protection and the destruction of the Universe, and he is eternal.

2. He creates the Universe either in sport or out of pity with the help of the act-force, or because it is his nature.

Refutation.

1. This conception of Puruṣa can be refuted in the same way as the conception of Îśvara has been refuted in the Îśvara-parîkṣâ (Vide item 5).

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

2. He does not create the Universe in sport, because in that case there should be no successive stages in creation. As he is eternal and able to create, everything will be produced simultaneously. The Universe is not created out of pity, because a god with pity will not create a Universe which is full of sorrow. If it is his nature, then also he will create the Universe all at once, and not by degrees, as he is eternal.

[By this refutation all other theories of a similar nature establishing Viṣṇu, Brahmâ, etc. as creators are also refuted].

VII. Âtmaparîkṣâ.

Examination of the Doctrine of Soul.

(i) of the Naiyâyikas.

1. There is an Âtman who is eternal and all-pervading, who imbibes the qualities such as of desire, knowledge, pleasure, pain, etc. occasionally, and whose nature is different from the Caitanya. That Âtman is the doer of all good or bad actions and the sole enjoyer of their results. Âtman is considered as born when he begets a new body endowed with a new mind with the feelings of pleasure, pain, etc; it is called death when he leaves the body he already possessed. According to the Âtman's good and bad actions he gets the body and the mind. When his body is injured the injury is considered as done to the Âtman. Inference will establish Âtman, inasmuch as all cognitions should be acknowledged by something, that is, by Âtman, who is different from the body, etc., because these being momentary, produce memory afterwards.

2. The desires, etc. should also depend on something, because they are effects, and that something is Âtman, in the same way as colour, etc., depend on some entity. Śaṅkarasvâmin.

3. All cognitions of form, taste, etc. rising in succession should depend on something, that is, on Âtman, because afterwards they are all recognized as "known by me". Uddyotakara.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

4. The word Âtman means a thing which is different from mind, etc., as this is never considered as a synonym of the words mind, body, etc. Uddyotakara

5. The living body will not possess life, etc., but would be just like a pot if there is no Âtman, which is the only differentiating entity amongst the two.

6. This Âtman should be acknowledged as eternal and all-pervading, because all varieties of knowledge should be acknowledged by the same Âtman who acknowledged the first consciousness in the child; and because the things which are able to produce the feelings of pleasure, pain, etc. to one Âtman should have some connection with that Âtman just as the body has. Aviddhakarṇa

7. This Âtman is also known by the perception of the ego.

Refutation.

1. If you want to establish an Âtman as the knower of all Vijñânas then there will be no disagreement between us, because we also accept the Omniscient as the perceiver of all kinds of knowledge. The S'râvakas and the Pratyeka Buddhas are also able to know other's knowledge. If that be so, there is nothing new in your theory. But against the Vijñânavâdins, who postulate that every knowledge is independent of the subject or the object, and is not recognized by anything else, you cannot establish anything of the nature of an Âtman.

2. If by the support of the desires, their cause is meant, in that case also there is no disagreement between us because we also hold that the desires have their causes. But if a real support is meant, then we will reply that for the desires, etc. which are not likely to fall down, no support is required.

3. Âtman cannot also be established on the strength of recollection, for recollection has no reality, because everything is momentary: a thing perceived in a particular moment can never be perceived again afterwards by any of the sense-organs.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

4. The word Âtman is also one of the synonyms of mind. Further, as there is no reality except the Vijñâna, there is no use searching for the meaning of Âtman. Moreover, if a word by reason of its having no synonym can establish a different thing as its meaning, then the word 'lotus of the sky' can also mean a different entity.

5. What is the connection of life with Âtman by means of which you affirm that wherever there is no Âtman there is no life? The connection cannot certainly be of identity as the two are quite different. They cannot be related to each other as cause and effect, because in that case the Âtman being eternal, life should also be eternal.

6. The Âtman being thus refuted, how can its eternity or all-pervadingness be established by the given reasons?

7. The perception of the ego feels only the self, and can never feel the eternity or all-pervadingness of the Âtman, but on the contrary will feel the colour, etc. of the body. So by this argument Âtman, cannot be established. The desires, etc. do not depend on the Âtman because they rise one after another in succession. If they depend on the Âtman, which is eternal, there should be no succession.

(ii) of the Mîmâṃsakas.

1. The Âtman is an eternal Spirit (Caitanya) which gets changes according as the feelings such as of pleasure, pain, etc., are often rising and disappearing. In all these changes the Spirit does not disappear. So the Âtman is continuous in the form of Caitanya with the additional changes, such as of pleasure, pain, etc. just as a serpent remains the same though it betakes itself often to the straight and crooked forms. This Caitanya also is not different from the Buddhi of the Sâṃkhyas.

2. The underlying Spirit should not be changing in the same way as the different feelings do. If everything is momentary then the action will be done by one, and its result will be enjoyed by another; in other words, the Caitanya of one moment which does an action cannot enjoy its result, while the Caitanya of another moment which did nothing will enjoy the result of it. That is unjust. So the Caitanya must be continuous to enjoy the results of all its previous deeds.

3. This Âtman can further be proved by the Vijñâna which feels the identity of the subject in different conditions experienced at different times. Unless an eternal Âtman is accepted, who will be that subject which will remain the same in all kinds of momentary changes? All these experiences must refer to one Âtman who is eternal and is in the form of Caitanya.

Refutation.

1. If this Caitanya and the Buddhi are the same, then Caitanya must also be non-eternal, because the Buddhi is expressed as non-eternal by you in so many instances. Jaimini, S'abara and Kumârila have said in many places that Buddhi is non-eternal. If the Buddhi is held to be one and eternal, and the changes caused according to the differences of objects, then how is it possible to justify those Vijñânas that rise in a place where there is no object. If you think that the objects seen in one place are causes of the new Vijñânas in another place where there is nothing, then, why are the previous places also not known where objects were really seen once? So these Vijñânas are independent and they do not require any objects as their causes. That knowledge also does not differ according to objects, because in many instances knowledge is seen to be caused without reference to a real object, such as the knowledge of the lotus of the sky, etc. The example of a serpent also does not seem relevent, because the serpent also being momentary is liable to get many changes. If that serpent remains the same it cannot get the changes. If you accept Âtman also as momentary then only it can get many changes.

2. The Caitanya which gets many different forms in different feelings, such as pleasure, pain, etc. should also differ according to its change of forms, just as the Caitanyas of different persons are held as different from each other only because they have different forms.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

3. The ego which continues to be the same in different experiences cannot be valid, because like all other kinds of knowledge this also rises without an object. This ego is caused by the Vijñâna which by continuous practice feels itself as eternal. That practice also does its work only at times and not always.

(iii) of the Sâṁkhyas.

1. The Buddhi is different from the Caitanya because Buddhi is evolved from the Pradhâna or primordial matter, while the latter is a form of Âtman. The Pradhâna is the author of all actions, but the Âtman being in the form of Caitanya only thinks as if every action is being done by him, and enjoys the result of those actions. Body, eyes, etc. are for the use of Âtman, because they are endowed with forms, just as a bed is useful for others.

2. The inanimate Pradhâna which acts when animated by coming in contact with Âtman, supplies all the wants of Âtman, just as a blind man being directed, helps the lame man on his shoulders.

3. The Âtman is like a mirror. The Buddhi of Pradhâna which comes in contact with the objects of knowledge only reflects in the Âtman, but the Âtman never gives up his own form by these reflections. It is said that the Âtman is the enjoyer of all things.

Refutation.

1. The Caitanya in the form of Âtman cannot be one and eternal, because there are so many Vijñânas such as of form, taste, etc. often rising and disappearing. If the nature of Âtman is one, how can he enjoy so many different things with one knowledge? It is also unjust that the Âtman who does nothing should enjoy the results of the acts done by Pradhâna.

2. Let the body, eyes, etc. be the helpers of the Âtman. But then it is necessary that the Âtman should be modified according as he takes the help of the different organs. If he is modified he will not be eternal. If there be no change then what is the nature of the help done by the helpers? If the Pradhâna supplies the wants of Âtman, then everybody can obtain anything he desires, for the Pradhâna, the only cause of the Universe, is always ready to supply the needs. The Pradhâna should also have Caitanya, otherwise how can it know and supply the wants of the Âtman? If it be so, then what is the difference between the Pradhâna and the Âtman?

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

3. If the reflections of Buddhi are not different from the Âtman who, like a mirror, receives them, then, the Âtman should also be non-eternal as the reflections are. If the reflections are different, then, how can it be said that the Âtman enjoys all things without himself being changed?

(iv) of the Digambara Jainas.

1. The Âtman is an entity and is animate and its conception amongst the Jainas is much the same as the Âtman of the Mîmâṁsakas. But it undergoes many changes according to the feelings such as of pleasure, pain, etc. Âtman has two forms: the Caitanya form of Âtman is eternal and constant, while the other form as a substance is always changing.

2. The changes such as of pleasure, pain, etc. are neither different from the Âtman because they occur in the Caitanya itself, nor are they same as Caitanya, because difference also is seen by the number, name and result.

3. The Âtman is a combination of two forms: one is the Caitanya, while the other comprises the different feelings of pleasure, pain, etc. This can very well be imagined just as we imagine the body of Nṛsiṁha or the 'man-lion god'.

Refutation.

1. If the Caitanya itself is changed with the feelings of pleasure, pain, etc. then it cannot be termed as eternal. But if it is not changed itself but only gets the changes then it cannot be said that the Âtman takes the forms of pleasure, pain, etc.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

2. If the Âtman and the feelings are not altogether different then why do you say that they differ in some other way? How can the difference and the sameness of a thing can exist in the same entity? There is nothing eternal in reality, but only the feelings of pleasure, pain, etc. are rising one after another in succession. The entity which appears to be continuous is unreal knowledge because all Vijñânas are similar.

3. As the Âtman is one it cannot have two forms. His two forms cannot be real unless there are two entities. The Nṛsiṁha also is not endowed with two forms: it is nothing but a conglomeration of Aṇus, which appears in the form of Nṛsiṁha.

(v) of the Advaitins.

1. There is nothing real—earth, water, fire, etc.—except the Vijñâna which is one and eternal. All other things which seem to exist are only the manifestations of that Vijñâna which is otherwise known as Âtman.

2. The bondage and liberation of the Âtman are not real because Âtman is always liberated.

Refutation.

1. There is only a slight error in this theory. Though the Âtman is accepted as one and eternal, still it is clear that there are many Vijñânas of form, taste, etc. differing from one another. There is no reason to prove the existence of any other eternal knowledge as different from the knowledge of form, taste, etc.

2. The bondage and liberation also cannot be explained in this theory because the Âtman being always liberated there is no possibility of its getting the bondage. No other cause has also been assigned for explaining bondage. If the Âtman is always liberated then the practice of austerities for obtaining liberation will be redundant.

(vi) of the Vâtsîputrîyas.

1. The Vâtsîputrîyas accept the Âtman or Pudgala which is neither different from the five Skandhas nor the same as the

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Skandhas. That Pudgala is the author of good and bad actions and the sole enjoyer of their fruits. It is neither eternal nor non-eternal, and it often takes the Skandhas and leaves them.

2. Buddha himself, when asked to define body and Âtman, replied that these cannot be differentiated, but he did not say that they are not existing; and once again he said that the five Skandhas are burdens and the Pudgala is the bearer of these burdens. Words of this kind from Buddha himself show that Buddha also accepted the Pudgala.

Refutation.

1. There cannot be anything which is at the same time neither the same with the Skandhas nor different from them. It is clear therefore that it is an absurd thing like a lotus of the sky. Contradictory qualities always differentiate the things in which they reside. How can the two opposite qualities, namely, the eternity and non-eternity can reside in the same Pudgala?

2. Buddha did not refute the theory of Pudgala because he had to instruct his pupils in accordance with their mental capabilities. As he was not bold enough to proclaim that the Âtman is non-existent he taught that it cannot be known as a separate entity. In other places the Pudgala is said by him as the bearer of burdens by which is meant the chain of the momentary Skandhas as the Pudgala who is the bearer of burdens.

Examination of the permanence of entities.

1. There are two kinds of entities, non-eternal and eternal. Non-eternal entities are destroyed whenever the cause of destruction is present. Entities cannot be said to be destroyed every moment without any cause, because destruction is perceptible only sometimes and not always. Aviddhakaraṇa.

2. The destruction of entities cannot take place every moment without its cause being present. A thing which has no cause

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

should be either non-existent like the lotus of the sky or be eternal. There is no third alternative. If destruction belongs to the first kind then everything must be eternal because there is no destruction. If destruction is held to be eternal then it cannot remain along with any other objects. If there are no objects how can destruction exist?

Uddyotakara.

3. Because some entities are eternal and others are non-eternal it does not necessarily follow that they should always produce some effect, for an entity is not that which has the power to produce an effect (Arthakriyâkâritâ) but only that which has an inherent existence (Sattâsamavâya). So they may exist even without producing an effect and be considered as entities.

4. Even if we consider the entities momentary, the effects cannot be produced by them, either one after another or at once. If the momentary entities are capable of producing effects themselves, there will be no necessity of assisting conditions. If they are not, then, how can the assisting conditions and the cause, all being momentary, produce the effect without helping each other and without producing some particular effect on one by the other? So things cannot be considered as momentary.

Bhadanta Yogasena.

5. The recognition of a thing can also establish the non-momentariness of entities. The recognition is also valid because it is different from memory and other kinds of invalid knowledge, as it does not feel only the thing which was already known as is the case with memory.

Kumârila.

6. The Vijñâna of entities such as the sun, moon, etc. feels only the things of that moment. But the entities are always existing. These cannot be momentary, because they are entities and objects of knowledge.

Bhâvivikta.

7. The series of Vijñânas in respect of a thing rising one after another in succession must be the reflections of one thing which is not momentary, because its oneness with the feelings is not afterwards proved invalid by other kinds of knowledge.

Uddyotakara.

Refutation.

1. Destruction is of two kinds: one consists in the entity itself being changed every moment, while the other is complete disappearance of a thing (Dhvaṁsa). We also accept that destruction has a cause, as others do, but in the first case, as the thing of a previous moment gives rise to a similar thing in the next, this kind of destruction is called causeless. In the second case the destruction cannot be called a special event which takes place only at times. This destruction is non-existent, as a lotus of the sky. Only the disappearanace of an entity is called destruction, and it is not a different thing as others hold. So there is no difficulty if we hold that everything is momentary and that destruction also is causeless.

2. One of the two different kinds of destruction consists in the disappearance of momentary things. This also has a two-fold aspect: viz., the disappearance of one kind of momentary things and its giving place to a dissimilar kind of momentary things. This first disappearance has no cause. The second kind of destruction takes place when one kind of momentary thing completely disappears and another kind of momentary thing takes its place. This kind of destruction have causes and assisting conditions. For example, when a pot is smashed with a stick into pieces then the momentary pot of the last moment with the help of the stick etc. gives rise to the pieces in the next moment.

3. There is nothing which is eternal, such as space, etc. If it is necessary to accept them they must also be accepted as momentary. Things are said to exist only when they are able to produce the expected effects, otherwise they are non-existent. The eternal things, if existent, must necessarily produce all effects at once and not one after another in succession, because they have the power to produce an effect. If these eternal entities expect the help of assisting conditions to produce an effect then it must be explained in what capacity they are assisting the material cause. If they create a power in the eternal thing then that power should be considered as the cause of the effect and not the eternal thing. Because these eternal entities are not able to produce the expected effects they must be considered as non-existent. If you say that the definition of an entity is not that which is capable of producing an effect but only one which has an inherent existence, we will reply that we do not consider anything has an inherent existence, and that existence alone cannot establish the permanancy of an entity.

4. If the entities are accepted as momentary, then the assisting conditions help the material cause in producing the same effect which the material cause is required to do. In the first moment the cause and the conditions combine themselves in a way so as to be able to produce the effect in the next moment. The conditions also undergo a change in the same way in helping the cause to produce the effect. If the things are eternal and if the assisting conditions create a power in them then why should they be termed causes?

5. Recognition cannot be called valid knowledge like perception, because it is described by the word 'same as that', and because it recognizes things as constant even though they are differing every moment. If it is accepted as a valid knowledge by others, even then it does not differ materially from memory which is considered as invalid knowledge.

6. According to the Vijñânavâdins the external world does not exist. There are therefore no things such as the sun, moon etc. except the Vijñâna, which is momentary. So it is useless for others to attempt to refute the momentariness of all things with the help of the sun, etc.

7. That the flame of a light differs every moment is accepted by all philosophers, even though it reflects in knowledge as one and continuous. If such feelings are invalid then why should not the knowledge of other things also be considered as invalid, because such Vijñânas also feel the things which differ every moment, such as childhood, youth, etc. as one. So non-momentariness of entities cannot be established.

Examination of the relation between action and its results.

1. If everything is considered as momentary, the action and its result, the causal connection, etc. cannot be explained in relation to the entities. One momentary entity which performs a good action cannot remain up to the time of its fructification, and the entity of another moment which does not do anything will be the enjoyer of the result. It is therefore unjust that one should act so that the others may enjoy.

2. No entity would perform any action if it knows for certain that what it will do others will enjoy.

3. No entity would be considered as the cause of any effect, because it will not remain the same when the effect will be produced. And it cannot produce the effect when it is destroyed.

4. The causal relation cannot also be explained because the cause and its effect do not remain in the same moment, and as there is no non-momentary or permanent entity which will perceive these momentary things.

5. The bondage and liberation refer to one entity and not to two entities. According to the doctrine of momentariness an entity which is in bondage does not get the liberation as the entity is momentary.

6. Memory also cannot be explained because one gets the perception and another the memory.

Refutation.

1. The causes certainly produce effects according to their powers. The causes of one moment produce the effect in the next even though that cause does not ramain in the moment when the effect is produced. So the Vijñâna which does an action produces another Vijñâna in the next moment with the conformation of the action, and the latter also gives rise to another. In this way in one stream of consciousness the action and its result can be explained. Therefore this is not unjust.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

2. Persons with an imperfect chain of momentary Vijñâna will be doing actions in order to obtain enjoyments, but the persons whose Vijñâna is perfect will feel the momentariness of everything, the non-ego everywhere, and will be doing good actions only in accordance with their conformations which are perfect.

3. Though the cause remains only in the first moment it can produce the effect in the second. We do not think that the effects are produced in a third momont. If it were so, the objection can be raised that the cause after destruction cannot produce the effect.

4. As the external objects and the Vijñâna are both momentary and connected with each other by the law of causation, the Vijñâna of one moment which has seen the cause is able indeed to produce the Vijñâna of the next moment which is endowed with the same conformations. So one chain can very well see the causes and their effects.

5. It is called bondage when the chain of consciousness being surcharged with bad conformations gives rise to the feelings of suffering, which continues in the same current of Vijñâna one after another. The liberation on the contrary is that when the stream of consciousness is free from all bad conformations as a result of perfect knowledge. So in one chain the bondage and liberation can be explained. But it would be difficult to explain for those who hold the eternity of the Âtman and affirm that the Âtman remains the same in bondage as well as in liberation. If Âtman changes, it cannot be considered as eternal.

6. In the same way memory also can be explained. The consciousness of one moment which preceives and begets conformation produces in another moment the memory in the same chain of consciousness.

X. Dravyaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Substance.

1. The Naiyâyikas and the Vaiśeṣikas hold that there are sixteen categories (Padârthas) in the whole Universe and the substance is one of them. It has nine divisions, namely, earth, water, fire, wind, space, time, direction, ego and mind. The first four are again divided into two, eternal and non-eternal, while all others are eternal. The atoms are eternal and their products are non-eternal.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

2. The atoms have no cause as there is no proof to show their existence, just as an ass-horn is non-existent. Aviddhakarṇa

3. There is something as substance on which colour, smell etc. depend. This substance can be perceived independently of form, colour, etc.; for example, if we take a crystal which appears red when the red colour of a flower reflects on it, but when we see the crystal independently it is without any colour, and that is called the substance.

4. The things we see are not the conglomerations of atoms because they are perceivable while the atoms are not. The parts (Avayava) and the whole (Avayavî) as constituted by the parts must be quite different as they have different powers, effects and creators. Uddyotakara and Bhâvivikta

5. The sound which is a product and non-eternal should also require space for origination. So space should be acknowledged as a substance.

6. There should be another substance by which, for instance, a man is perceived as young and grown-up later on. That is time.

7. There must be another substance by which we say that a thing is in the North, East, South, or West of me. That is Dik or direction.

8. Mind is also a substance in whose absence the sense-organs, eyes, etc. though ready, do not perceive the external objects.

[The 8th substance is the Âtman which has already been examined].

Refutation.

1. Substance is unreal because in respect of the eternal atoms they certainly do not exist. If so, all the effects to be produced by them should be produced at once, as they are always ready to work, and as they do not require the help of others being themselves eternal.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

2. The pot is a crowd of atoms. The cause of it can be inferred in the potter. The potter therefore is the cause of atoms. Again it is impossible to say a thing is causeless because its cause cannot be perceived. There are many things in the world the causes of which we are unable to know.

3. Crystal is nothing but colour. When the flower reflects in it, we see the red colour and not the stone. So it cannot be said that the crystal is a separate substance apart from its qualities. The knowledge which cognizes the stone as red is wrong.

4. As we have already established the momentariness of all things, the atoms should also be perceivable when they are made to conglomerate by the potter. In those moments when the atoms were separate they were not perceivable. There is no independent whole (Avayavî) except the parts (Avayava). The parts being nothing but momentary things, they are designated as a whole in some moments. But really the whole is nothing but the parts. In the moments when they are only parts they have some kind of power, effect and creator, and in other moments when they are called Avayavî they get different kinds of power, etc. So the whole is not at all an independent substance apart from the parts.

5. We admit that the sound must have a place of origination. But such a place is not different from the elements which are the causes of sound. Space cannot be accepted as eternal or as the place or cause of the origination of sounds. If it were so, all sounds would be produced at once and not one after another in succession.

6. All things being momentary, a man after his birth gives rise to another in the next moment and continues to do so every moment thereafter; when we see him we say he is young. Another man born before him who also likewise gives rise to another every moment is said to be a grown-up man. Beyond this, there is no other cause, namely, time, direction, etc.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

7. Further if the substances are eternal the Vijñânas caused by them should rise all at once and not one after another.

8. We also admit the mind as the sixth Vijñâna but it is not one and eternal. If it were so, all knowledge pertaining to the mind should rise all at once and not in succession.

XI. Guṇaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Quality.

1. The Naiyâyikas and the Vaiśeṣikas admit twenty-four qualities as residing in the nine substances previously mentioned.

2. Number is a separate quality, because the entities like elephants, etc. are known as one, two, three, etc. which are different from the knowledge of elephant, etc. Aviddhakarna

3. The seeds, water, earth, etc. are able to produce the seedlings, etc. But separately they cannot do so, because the union is wanting. So union or Saṁyoga should also be accepted as a separate quality. Udyotakara

4. There are three kinds of conformations,—Vega (motion) Bhâvanâ (tendency) and Sthitisthâpaka (elasticity) which cause continuous action in a substance, the memory of a thing already perceived, and bringing a thing back to the same position respectively. These three also should be considered as different qualities.

Refutation.

1. As substance which is the support of qualities is refuted there is no necessity of refuting the qualities again. The colour etc. do not reside in the substance. If the colour of a substance is one and is permanently in it, then it ought to be seen fully when a part of the substance only is perceived. If again, there are many colours in atomic form in one substance, they should be termed substances and not qualities, as they have the form of atoms.

2. Number cannot be called a different quality. When we see one elephant we do not perceive anything beyond the elephant. Similarly the measure also cannot be different from the substance in which the measure is said to reside. The difference also cannot be said to be a quality, because there is nothing except the substance which is being perceived. The knowledge of difference is nothing but the knowledge of the specific individuality.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

3. Union also cannot be called a quality. Water, etc., separately do not produce the seedling, not because there is want of union, for even though there is union the effect is not produced at all times but because there is absence of the earth, etc. of particular moments which are able to produce the result. All the qualities are nothing but the different kinds of Vijñânas.

4. Conformation also cannot be accepted as being of three kinds, Vega (motion), Bhâvanâ (tendency) and Sthitisthâpaka (elasticity) because it has been already established that everything is momentary, and that the previous things are the causes of the next ones. So the effects of these three conformations, continuous action, obtaining the previous position and the memory, are not produced by the conformations.

XII. Karmaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Action.

Action is a separate category (padârtha). It is of five kinds, Utkṣepaṇa (lifting up) Avakṣepaṇa (throwing down) Âkuñcana (bending inward) Prasâraṇa (stretching forward) and Gamana (motion). Action is known by perception, for instance, when we perceive a man moving from place to place. It can also be proved by inference, for instance, from the union and disunion of two entities. Two things cannot be united or disjointed without action.

Refutation.

As it has already been established that everything is changing every moment, there cannot exist anything which begets action only sometimes and not always. The thing which is without action one moment does not get action in the next moment, because the thing itself is not remaining the same. The moment it gets action it becomes something different, and action also is not different from thing of the moment.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It will be impossible for you to establish action on the strength of things which are permanent, because a thing without changing itself cannot get different actions, such as, walking etc. If action is considered inherent in its nature, then it must be always moving and should not remain without action. Moreover, it is not possible that one thing should have two different natures, a moving nature and a permanent nature: the two are mutually contradictory.

When we see things moving from one place to another, they are really not moving, but they are being produced every moment by the previous things with such powers that their effects are able to produce further effects in distant places.

XIII. Sâmânyaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Generality.

1. Sâmânya or generality is of two kinds: Para (superior) and Apara (inferior). Parasâmânya is the mere existence of the categories, substance, quality and action. This generality is one in these things as these are felt in one knowledge as existent. Each Padârtha is also endowed with a generality which is inferior to the Parasâmânya, and which being existent in all entities serves the purpose of knowing all the sub-divisions of substance as such, and the substance as something different from the qualities.

2. The existence of generality is proved by perception, for instance, when we feel that a thing is existent, or it is a substance or quality, etc. It can also be proved by inference. The cognition such as it is existent, it is a substance, it is a quality, etc., must be caused by some special things, namely, existence etc., because by these cognitions we feel in the entities different qualities from that of other Vijñânas of the same thing. Bhâvivikta

3. There should be some general characteristics which enable us to designate all the different cows as cows, though they differ from each other. It is the individual body of the cows that differs, but the generality of a cow (Gotva) belongs to every cow and does not differ even though the individual cows may differ. Uddyotakara

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

4. This generality remains only in substance, quality and action, because generality is unnecessary in other kinds of knowledge, as they are not many, and as there is no such knowledge which feels their generality.

Refutation.

1. The categories having already been refuted, there is neither existence nor substances in them. The knowledge such as it is existent, or it is a substance, etc., is only the outcome of experience and memory of the words concerned. A man does not know a thing to be existent in the beginning, but he learns that from the elders. Afterwards, whenever he sees a thing he remembers its similarity with the previously experienced things, and uses the same word.

2. The existence of generality cannot be proved by inference, because the knowledge of the existence of a particular thing does not feel anything else than the thing itself. When we say it exists we do not feel anything else in the thing which may be called existence.

3. If you hold that one generality belongs to all cows, even then that generality cannot be eternal and one. Had it been so, the knowledge of cow, etc. will always appear because its cause is always present. Persons who are cooks by profession are called cooks. Do you want to accept any genus as Pâcakatva? Similarly, non-existence is always known by the word "non-existence." To justify this do you want to establish a genus in non-existence also? If you hold that the same action is the reason for designating the cooks as cooks, then it will not be correct, because action differs in each individual of the group. If you put forth similarity of action as the reason, then the reply will be the same in the case of cows also. Why then do you want to establish a different genus as eternal in the cows?

4. As soon as a pot is produced, wherefrom does the genus get united with the pot? Is it because the Ghaṭatva of other pots is moving about, leaving its own support (i. e., the pots) in order to get united with the newly created pot? If so, how can the genus move about and remain without the species which is its support? If that genus is held to be created along with the creation of the pot, in that case generality becomes non-eternal. If the genus is one in all things, then the genus of all things should be seen whenever one of the species is perceived. It is therefore certain that the cognitions of pot, tree, etc. are not caused by the genus which is held to be eternal and one, because they are appearing one after another, and not all at once, which would have been the case if the genus were really one and eternal.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Thus the genus as acknowledged by the Naiyâyikas and the Vais'eṣikas is refuted here. The generality as accepted by the Jainas, Jaiminîyas and Sâṁkhyas will be refuted in the Syâdvâda

XIV. Vis'eṣaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Particularity.

1. Particularity is the fifth category of the Vais'eṣikas. Particularity lies in the eternal things, such as space, atoms, etc. and is the cause of knowing them as separate from each other. The eternal things are perceived by the ascetics, and they are helped by particularity to know that each atom differs from the other.

2. Everything is to be known as separate from the other by some special qualities it possesses. We could not know the eternal entities as different from each other had there been no particularity which resides in them.

3. The different particularities do not require anything else to separate them. They possess peculiar powers so as to be known as separate from each other, and they can separate the eternal entities, just as an impure thing which is endowed by nature with impurity has power to impart impurity to others. Pras'astamati.

Refutation.

1. As it is already established that everything is momentary, there is no possibility of an eternal thing for which these particularities are necessary.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

2. It must first be answered whether the atoms are separate from one another or not. If they are separate in that case why do the ascetics who perceive the atoms require the help of particularity to know that they are separate? If they are really mixed then how can the particularity separate them, and how would such an erratic knowledge of the ascetic be correct when it perceives the mixed atoms as separate?

3. If particularities have the power to separate themselves as also to separate the atoms, why then should not the atoms also have such power, and what is the necessity of creating particularity by way of an additional difficulty? Further, there are no impure things by nature. The thing which is impure to one is considered pure by others. So it is the creation of mind. If it were real then also by the touch of the impure thing, other things will always be impure. As the atoms are eternal they cannot therefore be caused by particularity.

XV. Samavâyaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Inherence.

1. Inherence should be accepted as the connection between such entities as parts and the whole, quality and the substance etc, because such cognitions as the cloth is in the thread, colour is in the pot, imply consciousness of a connection between the two. This is what is called inherence. Inherence is one and eternal, because it is causeless, and is therefore different from union (saṁyoga).

2. Though inherence is one and eternal, the inherence of substance would not be felt as such in the quality, because the substance only has the power to represent its own inherence as the quality has the power to represent the same of its own, just as the union of things though similar can never be the cause of bringing one thing to another resting place. Praśastamati.

3. Inherence is not destroyed, though the entities united by it may be destroyed; for instance, if the colour of a pot is destroyed the inherent smell of the pot remains, and if both are destroyed the pot itself remains in its material parts. So inherence is eternal.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Refutation.

1. None but the Naiyâyikas cognize that the cloth is in the thread. Everyone feels the contrary is the case: in the trees there are branches and in the cloth there are the threads. How can such contradictory cognitions establish such a category as inherence? Further, it is already established that there is no whole except assemblance of the parts. The knowledge of colour in a pot does not require inherence; it is the nature of the pot to have colour. So what is called inherence is nothing but the nature of the thing itself.

2. If inherence is one and eternal in all things connected in this way, such as the parts and the whole, quality and substance etc., then you cannot reply to the objection that in the thread will also be cognized the pot, elephant, etc. because they are also inherent in something. The special power which you want to impart to substance, etc. will also be created in particular substances according to the inherence. The inherence being the same in everything, how can you say that its powers are fixed only with reference to certain things and not to everything?

3. The inherence cannot be eternal, because if the connection of a pot with its parts is eternal then the pot should also be eternal. But it is not eternal. Moreover, if the part and the whole are destroyed how can inherence connecting the parts with the whole remain? When colour is destroyed, you say, the inherent smell remains in the pot. It must first be answered whether this inherence of smell is the same as that of colour. If the same, then how could colour disappear? If not, the inherence cannot be one.

XVI. S'abdârthaparîkṣâ.

Examination of the relation between the word and its corresponding object.

1. If the categories which are known in our daily life and are designated by words, were not really existing, then, what will be the cause of the cognitions and words such as 'the ascetic',

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

'white', 'going', 'existent', or sentences like 'cloth is in the thread' etc., which are really caused in our opinion by the categories, viz., substance, quality, action, generality, inherence, etc?

2. Words are capable of designating three things, manifestation, form and genus, as, for example, the body, the connection of the parts to the whole body and the genus which exists in all things of that group. Gautama.

3. Some hold that words such as 'cow' etc. really mean the existence of entities, in the same way as the words 'heaven' or 'God' mean something. It is not certain as to whether the things meant by the words are in existence or not. But people of their own accord are used to designate one particular thing by one particular word. Bhartṛhari.

4. Others hold that the words mean nothing but a combination of certain special characteristics, such as the word 'Brâhmin' means the combination of qualities, austerity, purity, birth etc. just as the word 'forest' means an accumulation of trees. Or the words may mean a new thing, which may be caused by the combination of qualities.

5. Others say that the words mean only the real substance which though it passes through many unreal changes yet continues to remain the same in every change; just as gold remains the same even though it undergoes changes in the forms of different ornaments, such as bangles, earrings, etc.

6. Others think that the words and the objects represented by them are one and the same. Only the words are meant by the external objects. People by constant practice think that the words, 'cow', etc. have a form corresponding to the external objects, cow, etc.

7. Others hold that the mind possesses many impressions such as cows, horses, etc. which are produced by paintings, letters etc. When the word 'cow' is pronounced when referring to a cow the mental impression of a cow reflects the external thing. So the ideas of the mind previously preserved there when reflecting worldly objects are called the meanings of the word (शब्दार्थ).

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

8. Others think that there is no connection between the word and the external object, but the word by constant practice rouses the memory of the external object, just as an elephant goad causes the elephant to act.

9. The words 'cow' etc. mean only the external objects but not the negation of their opposite, for example the word 'cow' does not mean that it is not a not-cow. If the word means the negation of its opposite, in that case there must be some other word to designate the cows as cows, because one word cannot produce two different kinds of knowledge. So negation of the opposite cannot be the meaning of the word. Bhâmaha.

10. The word does not mean the negation of its opposite. If by the negation of the opposite you mean a common quality existing in all species of the group, for example, a common quality in all cows, in that case it will be the same as our Gotva (quality of being a cow). If negation means non-existence only, in that case the outward appearance of the world will be S'ûnya or void, and the Vijñânas of cow, horse, etc. will not represent any object but only the forms of Vijñâna. If so, the nature of Vijñâna will be in the forms of cows, etc. and it will not be necessary to postulate the form of Vijñâna as the negation of the opposite. Kumârila.

11. Negation of the opposite cannot be the meaning of the word. Negation is possible only in the case of such words as 'cows' where not-cows are existing, but it will be impossible in the case of Sarva which will be meaningless as there is nothing that may represent the opposite of Sarva. If you hold that every individual is different from Sarva then, what will be that Sarva which is different from every one? Uddyotakara.

12. In no way the negation of the opposite can be meant by the word. There are things existing which are often expressed by the words, and between the objects and the words there must be some connection which will lead people to understand objects expressed by the words.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Refutation.

1. The categories, like substance etc. by which the knowledge of 'ascetics' etc. may be held to be produced are unreal. The cause of such Vijñâna is not the categories but the tendency (Vâsanâ) of the mind which, with the help of the words, produce the Vijñânas, such as of the ascetic etc. So it is not necessary to formulate the existence of the external objects as the causes of these Vijñânas.

2. The manifestation of a thing cannot be regarded as the meaning of the word, because the word does not possess the power of expressing the same thing at all times. Things differ every moment. A word which expresses one thing at one moment cannot express the same thing in another moment, because that thing ceased to exist in the subsequent moment and thereafter. If you hold that things are not momentary, even then as manifestations of things differ from each other, it is impossible to use the same word for other manifestations than that in which the power of the word has once been ascertained. The genus also in which the power of the word could be ascertained has already been refuted.

3. The existence of an external object which is meant by the word is either the manifestation of the object or the generality. If so, it cannot be explained as to how the word once used to mean one kind of manifestation can be used in other manifestations. If mere existence of the object is meant by the word, how can it mean a cow or a horse? If you say that both existence and the genus are meant by the word in that case we will reply that you are adding something to the original thesis, namely the generality which has already been refuted.

4. If words mean the combination of qualities or a new thing resulted by the combination, then how can the word used in one combination be used in another combination which is altogether different from the previous one? There is no generality which will protect you.

5. In the Prakṛtiparîkṣâ we have already refuted that there is nothing real which continues to be the same in all its unreal changes. So the theory that a real and continuous thing is the meaning of word is untenable.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

6. If you think that external objects meant by the word and the words themselves are one, how then will your thesis be valid, as we have already proved that no external object can be represented by the word? If you hold that the word itself appears in the mind with another form of the object then there will be no difference between this and the following argument.

7. The form of the mind cannot be said to be the meaning of the word because one form of mind will not remain in other moments when the word may next be used. Without knowing the power of the word how can it be used in the different forms of the mind?

8. If the word 'cow' for instance is the only cause of the knowledge of a cow and if this knowledge really depends on the external object, then the word cannot reasonably be the cause of the different kinds of knowledge such as grief, joy, etc. in different persons; because an object, the knowledge of which is produced by the word cannot have so many forms. If on the other hand these Vijñânas depend not on the different forms of the object but on the tendency of the mind how, then can people take action on external objects which really do not exist? If the external objects are created according to the power of Vijñânas, and on those actions are justified, then what is the reason of this misconception of taking action on things which do not exist? If the reason is the negation of the opposite, in that case you accept our theory.

Again, the external objects being momentary cannot be understood always by the words, because they are differing every moment. If they are not momentary then the Vijñânas can not be produced one after another.

9. We accept two kinds of negations, positive and negative. Positive negation may differ again according as it is internal or external. The Vijñâna of a cow is internal and positive negation because a cow is nothing but a negation inasmuch as it is by nature different from the not-cows. The Vijñâna also which is caused by the word and is possessed of the reflection of the cow is called negation of the opposite for three reasons:, because it is different from other Vijñânas such as of horse, etc; secondly, because it reflects an object which is by nature different from the others; and thirdly, because it depends on an object, which is different from others. The positive negation which is external, is the external object itself, because it is by nature different from others. The negative negation is that when we know an object as different from others.

We hold that the negation of the opposite is the meaning of the word. The Vijñâna of a cow is said to be the negation which is caused in the mind by the word 'cow'. So it is said that the negation is the meaning of the word, and they are connected by the law of causation: the word is the cause and the negation is the result. Similarly, the other two kinds of negation also represent the meaning of the word. When we see a cow which is by nature a negation and when we designate it by the name 'cow' then the word itself means the negation of the opposite. The second kind of negation is also the meaning of the word. When we say it is not a horse, etc., while explaining the meaning of the word 'cow' it clearly shows that the negation is the meaning of the word.

Now as the negation of the opposite is explained there is no room for the objections raised by Bhâmaha, because we only hold that both the Vijñâna and the reflection of the Vijñâna are the meaning of the word. These are negations by nature and represent the meaning of the word.

10. Kumârila should not also blame us because the negation we accept as the meaning of the word cannot be the same as his generality (e. g., Gotva), as our negation is a form of knowledge while the generality of his is a thing common to all members of a group. We also admit the non-existence of all external objects except the Vijñâna, but as people believe in the existence of external objects corresponding to the Vijñâna, it is necessary for us to point out that the Vijñâna, which reflects the outward object feels only the negation of the opposite.

11. The word 'all' (Sarva) is used always with reference to a group of objects, such as all cows, etc. The negation in that case will represent all objects different from these groups. If you say that the word 'all' embraces all things existing in the world, in that case each individual thing will represent its opposite and can be called not-all. As we consider everything as the creation of the Vijñâna, it is not very difficult for us to explain the negation in words like sarva, jñeya, etc.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

12. Now that we have proved that only the negation of the opposite is the meaning of the word there is no other generality than the negation in the objects. the external objects are also the creations or the reflections of the Vijñâna. The tendency of the mind is the only means whereby we know the meaning of the words, and there is no other connection between the word and its meaning than that of cause and effect.

XVII. Pratyakṣaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Perception.

1. There are two kinds of perception: one is indeterminate which reflects only the general form of a thing, or in other words, its existence as some indefinite thing, and the second is determinate which reflects the special characteristics of the thing perceived. Sumati.

2. We call it indeterminate when we perceive a thing without knowing or noticing any speciality or generality just like the perception of a child or of a dumb man who is unable to discriminate. No general or special quality of the thing perceived does reflect in the Vijñâna which depends only on the form of the thing. We describe that Vijñâna as determinate which rises afterwards and is dependent on the first indeterminate perception. This may be illustrated by the following example: when a man enters a room out of the glaring hot sun he perceives in the beginning all things generally without differentiation, but slowly afterwards he is able to differentiate between them. The first kind of perception is called indeterminate while the second is called determinate. Kumârila.

3. Wrong knowledge such as the conch is yellow is also

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

perception because that also reflect the conch as it is, and serves the purpose expected from the conch. So in the definition of perception the word free from error should not be used. Dinnâga.

4. Pain, pleasure, etc. are not Vijñânas because they are known only as feelings and not as Vijñânas, just as a pot being once known is not called a Vijñâna. But the pleasure and the knowledge of pleasure remain in one place. The perception of pleasure is created by the mind which is one of the sense-organs.

S'aṅkarasvâmin.

5. The proof of perception and the result of perception are two different things. When an outward object is known, the knowledge of that object, and the identity of the knowledge with the object are the result and proof respectively. These two should not be considered as one merely because they are related with one another as cause and effect, just as an axe and the cutting. Kumârila.

Refutation.

1. Pratyakṣa may be defined as knowledge which is free from reflection (Kalpanâ). We see a thing first and then realise it as a pot. The perception is but the first sight of a thing without connecting it with a name. The classification as proposed by Sumati cannot be correct because we do not hold that an entity can have any adjectives by which the perception can be differentiated as indeterminate or determinate. On the contrary, we hold the form of a thing as different from all other things or as the negation of the opposite. When the entity is felt in the mind this negation of the opposite also does not reflect. So the knowledge reflecting a thing without its name or attributes is perception. Determinate knowledge is not valid because it reflects things which really do not exist.

2. If the knowledge of the form of a thing is only held to be indeterminate then it will not be different from determinate knowledge, because we have already proved that there is no generality except the form of a thing. Kumârila has also said in certain places that generality does not differ from the form of a thing. If in determinate perception the generality, etc. are known, then the determinate perception will not differ from the invalid memory which reflects a thing which was once known. The indeterminate perception giving rise to many varieties of determinate or wrong knowledge becomes the cause of the worldly conceptions.

3. The knowledge of a conch as yellow cannot be called perception, because it is a wrong knowledge, though it serves the purpose expected from the conch. But it does neither serve the function in the form as it was understood before nor is it yellow as was known previously. Failing to be correct in these two respects how can it be called a proof? As this kind of knowledge cannot represent the proof of perception, the word free from error should be added to its definition.

4. If pleasure, etc. are accepted to be known by a knowledge and are not themselves regarded as varieties of knowledge, then as everything is proved to be momentary, pleasure and its knowledge cannot remain at one time because both are caused by the mind and mind must produce the two one after another and not both at the same time. The name by which we designate a thing cannot be a real proof of its nature. If any one calls knowledge by the word ignorance it cannot be correct. Similarly, pleasure also though called pleasure is in reality the Vijñâna itself.

5. Really there are no two things such as proof and its result. The knowledge rises with the form of a thing. It is called the knowledge of a certain thing, because it has the form of that thing. Only by this fact the form of a thing in knowledge and the knowledge of that thing are said as really connected with one another as cause and effect.

XVIII. Anumânaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Inference.

According to a Buddhist, Inference is of two kinds; the first is for self and the second for the sake of others. The first is produced by the middle term which is endowed with three qualities, namely, the existence of the sign in the minor term, the existence of the sign in homologue, non-existence of the sign in heterologue. The second kind of inference is caused by explaining the middle term with the three qualities. When the middle term has only one or two qualities it is called a fallacious reason.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

1. This is not correct. The middle term possesses only one quality and not three. That will be called a correct reason which has invariable concomitance with the major term. There are reasons which are not endowed with the three qualities, but may be valid in inference, as they have Anyathânupapatti, for example, both existence and non-existence exist because they are knowable. Here the middle term has neither homlogue nor heterologue both being minor terms. Pâtrasvâmin.

2. If the existence of the sign in the minor term, etc. are the necessary attributes of the middle term, then how can the rising of the moon be the reason of the opening of the lotus and the flowtide of the sea? This reason does not possess the three qualities.

3. In the inference for others the thesis is also the first part of the reasoning, besides these three limbs. If the thesis is not accepted, then how without knowing the major term can the homologue and the heterologue be ascertained? So the thesis is to be accepted as one of the limbs (avayavas) in inference.

4. Application should also be accepted as an additional limb of the inference for others. Diṅnâga refused it in view of the fact that it becomes a repetition by the statement of reason. But really it is not a repetition, because the statement of reason does not furnish the existence of the sign in the minor term, while the application does so and therefore becomes necessary. Bhâvivikta.

5. Conclusion also is a part of the inference for others. But Diṅnâga refused it, because he thought it might be a repetition of the thesis and the middle term. But really it is not so, because the proposition gives an idea of the major term which is to be established by the middle term, while conclusion states the same as

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

established by reason. Again, it removes all doubts concerning the major term and the middle term, which are not done by the other members. Uddyotakara

6. Again, the other parts of reasoning supply their own reasons without any connection with each other, while conclusion connects all reasons supplied by them. So conclusion is necessary. Aviddhakarṇa

7. Inference should be divided as commonly seen and specially seen. The sun being seen in two different places in the morning and evening makes us infer its movements just as the movement of a man. It is of the first kind. When one, after seeing the smoke and fire together, infers the presence of fire when he sees the smoke again: this belongs to the second kind.

S'abara and Vindhyavâsin

8. Inference cannot be a proof, because it is dependent on a middle term which is endowed with three qualities. Such reasons can also cause wrong knowledge. In every inference the reason is not only able to prove the major term, but it can very well prove its complete absence also. Câryakâs

9. It is impossible to infer a thing by the invariable concomitance of the middle term with the major term, because the power of the things are changed often according to time and place. Bhartṛhari

10. Inference for others cannot be a proof either to the speaker because he understands it first and then speaks to others; or for his antagonist who hears, because in his case the inference is for his own self as he understands the things through his ear which is one of his sense-organs.

Refutation.

1. The middle term which is anyathânupapanna (invariably concomitant with the major term) alone without the three qualities mentioned cannot be a correct reason. If so the transitoriness can be inferred in the sound by the reason of its being seen. This reason has the invariable concomitance (anyathânupapanna)

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

but it cannot be a valid reason. Three qualities are necessary for the middle term, but here, as the reason is not present in the minor term, the inference cannot be valid.

2. The rising of the moon makes us infer the opening of the lotus. The time which is the cause of the rising of the moon is also the cause of the blossoming of the lotus. So the rising of the moon, through its own cause, makes us infer the blossoming of the lotus. There should, therefore, exist a connection between the major term and the middle term, which must be endowed with the three qualities.

3. The thesis need not be the part of a syllogism, as it shows simply the minor and major terms, which are not at all useful in reasoning. Even without knowing the words "homologue" and "heterologue", a layman also easily understands the major and minor terms, when the three qualities of the middle term are explained.

4. If the application is useful because it supplies the existence of the sign in the minor term, then what is the use of the statement of reason? It cannot supply the reason alone, and the application does this also. So it is necessary that the middle term should show its existence in the minor term. In that case the application becomes useless.

5. After explaining the three qualities of the middle term there remains no doubt which is to be removed by conclusion. If you still entertain some doubts, then how is it possible for you to say that the doubts would not be entertained even after the conclusion as well?

6. The major and middle terms are connected with each other as cause and effect, or as invariable concomitants. The other members of the syllogism supply further connection. Hence conclusion is not necessary for establishing connection.

7. There cannot be any inference as Viśeṣato dṛṣṭa because we have already proved that everything is momentary. The fire which was once seen with smoke cannot be inferred afterwards, it cannot exist in subsequent moments. The fire that is inferred something else than that which was already seen. So there is onl one kind of Inference, namely the Sâmânyato dṛṣṭa (commonly seen

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

8. Inference can be valid proof because it is produced by reason with the three characteristics. These qualities would lea us to think that the knowledge produced by that reason woul serve the purpose expected from it. That which is able to serv the purpose expected from it is a proof. So why should inferen be not a proof? The wrong reason also which is used to misle the opponent is a proof, inasmuch as it serves the purpose expecte from it.

9. A middle term which is undoubtedly decided to be th effect of the major term or is invariably concomitant wit it, and the inference by which we are often successful, wi not lose its power owing to the difference of place and tim but would certainly cause the knowledge of the object to b proved.

10. Inference for others becomes a valid proof in view o the fact that the hearer understands the reasons, etc. by hearin the words. But in the inference for one's own self the ma looks at the smoke, etc. And in this respect the two kinds o inference differ.

Examination of other kinds of proofs.

(i) S'abdapramâṇa.

Proof of Word.

The Word is another proof which enables us to know thing which are not knowable by perception or inference. It is of tw kinds; human and divine. Human words become valid proof onl when the originator is regarded as an authority. Divine words ar always valid.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Refutation.

As it has already been proved that everything is momentary it is impossible for the divine word to exist. If it exists then the sentences would be meaningless, as there is no speaker whose ideas would be conveyed by the words as their meanings. So the Vedas also are not divine but human. The words of an authority cannot be valid proofs, because it is impossible to find out a man who will satisfy all the conditions required by an authority. Further, it has already been established that there is no connection between the word and its meaning. So the proof of the word does not differ from the inference established before.

(ii) Upamânapramâṇa.

Proof of Comparision.

One who wants to know about the animal Gavaya asks a forester who informs him that Gavaya is similar to a cow. This knowledge of comparison is accepted as a proof by the old Naiyâyikas, while S'abarasvâmin considers that this does not differ much from the proof of the word. He formulated that a man who sees the Gavaya in the forest after comparing it with a cow thinks at once of the similarity of a cow with the Gavaya. This is neither perception (as the cow is not present there), nor memory (as the similarity was not known before). So comparision should be a different proof.

Refutation.

This comparision does not differ much from the memory, because the Gavaya seen in the jungle by reason of its similarity with the cow raises the memory of a cow in the mind. The memory is also not a proof, as it reflects the thing which was known previously. If we admit proofs like these, then there would be no end to it: e. g. in a row of trees, unless we see the second tree we cannot have the knowledge of the first tree as the first. The second tree then will also be a different proof for the knowledge of the first tree! The comparision of the Naiyâyikas also does not differ from memory, because after seeing the Gavaya the man remembers the similarity with a cow when informed by the forester.

(iii) Arthâpattiparîkṣâ.

Examination of Presumption.

S'abarasvâmin accepts presumption as a different proof, which splits itself into two divisions, seen and heard. If a cloth is thrown into the fire it burns. Either on seeing or hearing this we conclude that fire has the power to burn things. On seeing the rise and setting of the sun we conclude that the sun has movements. This knowledge of unknown things are caused by the proof of presumption.

Refutation.

Presumption cannot be accepted as a valid proof as these kind of knowledge can be produced by inference. Again, there is no power which is to be known by presumption except the things which are held as endowed with powers. And these things such as fire, etc. also are known by the proof of perception.

(iv) Abhâvapramâṇaparîkṣâ.

Examination of non-existence as a valid proof.

The Mîmâṁsakas accept non-existence as a different proof. The absence of all proofs is a proof indeed because we know from that the absence of a thing. This absence of proof for a thing is caused when the eternal Vijñâna is not changed on reflecting a thing, or when the Vijñâna reflecting some other thing than that is not existing. The absence of a thing may also have a fourfold division, such as, Prâgbhâva (antecedent) Pradhvaṁsâbhâva (subsequent), Anyonyâbhâva (mutual) and Atyantâbhâva (absolute). Thus non-existence is also an entity. So the absence of proof to ascertain a thing, proves the absence of that thing, and becomes one of the proofs.

Refutation.

If only the absence of perception, etc. can prove the non-existence of a thing, then in sleep and in unconcious stages many non-existent things can be known, because sleep also is an unchanged state of Vijñâna. If the non-existence of a thing and the non-existence of proofs are real entities, then why this could not be seen by perception itself? Again, how can the absence of proof be accepted as an entity? Was it known by another absence of proof? In that case there would be no end to the creation of such absences. So absence of proof or non-existence of proof is not a different proof from perception.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

(v) Yuktyanupalabdhivicâra.

Examination of affirmative-negative inseparable connection and non-perception.

Caraka accepts a proof which is known as affirmative negative inseparable connection or Yukti. Whenever there is a cause there is the effect, and when there is no cause there is no effect. This is a proof to know the causal relation of two things. This cannot be perception because it is determinate; nor can it be inference because there is no homologue nor heterologue. Again, by the presence of knowledge we know the existence of a thing; the absence of knowledge is a proof of the absence of a thing.

Refutation.

The affirmative-negative inseparable connection which is held as a separate proof is not different from the causal relation. Again, the absence of a thing does not differ from the absence of the knowledge of that thing, which are held by you as proof and thesis respectively.

(vi) Sambhavaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Probability.

Probability should be accepted as a proof and is useful to know the hundred which is included in a thousand. When a thousand is known to be existing, we can by probability know that there is a hundred. This knowledge of a hundred is not caused by any other proof, and that is why probability is a different proof.

Refutation.

This does not differ from the inference from the effect to the cause, because the hundreds are the causes to make a thousand. By seeing the effect it is easy to infer the cause.

Examination of Tradition and Intelligence.

Tradition is an understanding among the people. The there is a devil in this banyan tree is a tradition. Tradition therefore is a proof for those who come afterwards. Intelligence is the sudden appearance in the mind of the existence of a thing; for example, tomorrow my brother is to come, etc. So tradition and intelligence should be admitted as separate proofs.

Refutation.

This tradition and intelligence cannot be accepted as valid proofs because they are not always correct. These are proved to be incorrect many a time.

XX. Syâdvâdaparîkṣâ.

Examination of the perfect knowledge of things.

1. Every entity has twofold qualities: one is common to all things and gives rise to the knowledge of an object as an object; the other is special belonging to that entity only. For example a pot is called an object because it has the quality of being called an object, and it is also called a pot. If the pot were altogether different from all other objects then it would not be an object like a lotus of the sky. Again, it should not altogether be the same as other objects. If it were so, in that case it can not be differentiated from other objects. So it is quite reasonable that an entity should possess two different qualities, one general and the other special. Ahrîka

2. An entity may be one but may possess two qualities because such is our experience in daily life. By one of the two qualities it does not differ from other objects, while by the other it differentiates itself from other objects; just as the deity Narasimha is endowed with two different natures. Sumati

3. Just as a thing with many colours is called white or black according to the wishes of the speaker, similarly a thing with many qualities may be designated by one quality only. But it is not possible to designate an object with two qualities at one and the same moment.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Kumârila.

4. A thing has three natures; for example, gold, being one in all changes, may take the other two forms and still be called as gold.

Refutation.

1. It must first be cleared up whether the two qualities imposed on an entity differ from each other or not. If they differ then how can one entity possess two different natures without itself being different? If they do not, then what is the reason for formulating two qualities and not one? So it is impossible to say that one thing has two qualities. If an entity differs from all other objects, it does not necessarily mean that the entity is impossible like a flower in the sky but it may be called a different object.

2. How can one thing really possess two contrary qualities at the same time, namely, the difference and sameness with other objects? If it is seen in daily life it cannot be correct. Narasiṁha does not possess two different natures, but there are two crowds of atoms which are to be known as Narasiṁha when combined.

3. One entity cannot be one and many at the same time. There does not exist any entity which may possess many colours but remain one at the same time. This is self-contradictory. According to the nature of the qualities the entities should also differ. If you think, as the Buddhists do, that by reflection (Kalpanâ) only a thing is considered as apparently differing and not differing from other objects by reason of the two qualities, but that there are no qualities really existent, then we have no quarrel with you.

4. New birth, sameness and change, are contrary qualities. Gold cannot have these three without itself being changed. All things being momentary gold also changes every moment, takes the different forms and produces a variety of knowledge such of necklace, vardhamânaka, etc.

3. If the past and the future do not exist, how could Buddha teach the doctrine of Dependent Origination of the past and future things?

4. The action done in the past would fail to show result, as they are past and do not exist.

5. How could the emancipated ascetics predict the future or recall the past if they did not exist always?

Refutation.

1. (i) Bhadanta Dharmatrâta, who holds that an entity remains the same in all its changes through the three times, does not differ from the Sâṁkhyas, and as such he is to be refuted by the reasons by which Sâṁkhya is refuted.

(ii) Bhadanta Ghoṣaka also does not differ much from the previous author. If the things have always three natures, then in what consists the difference? Why is only one among them useful for the worldly conventions? The example of a man is not to the point, because the man's love is deeper in the case of one woman, though he may have love for other women also. Such is not the case with the entities, which do not acquire new qualities.

(iii) Buddhadeva cannot limit himself only to the three courses of an entity. In every course there may be another three courses. For instance, the past may be called as present if we take it to be the middle moment in view of its previous and future moments.

(iv) Vasumitra's view is now being refuted elaborately. He must first answer whether his power of action in respect of an entity differs from the entities or not. If it differs, then the present entity should be formless in the past and future times, as the power of action (kâritra) of the present entity does not exist either in the past or in the future. If they are existing, they should be eternal, as they are always the same. If they are eternal, then they can not be the cause of any effect (vide—Sthirabhâvaparîkṣâ). Again, the power of action is not included in one of the five Skandhas (elements), and he will not be called a Buddhist who will accept something else which is not included among the Skandhas. If, on the other hand, the power of action does not differ from an entity, then that also will always remain with the entity. How then would the past and future be explained as the thing is endowed always with the power of action or kâritra.

2. The knowledge of past things rise in the mind as if creating anew the existence of a thing which once existed. So looking to the possibility the knowledge of future things may also arise. So these Vijñânas are nothing but unreal reflections.

3. Bhagavân Buddha admitted two kinds of Dependent Origination on the strength of the admission of unreal support of the Vijñânas. The Vijñânas therefore, depending on the unreal supports of the past etc., may rise as past etc.

4. Action is the cause of the result. But it produces many momentary actions one after another. But we in our ignorance think that the same action has produced the result.

5. The emancipated, seeing the present things which are either causes or effects of the future or the past, recall the past or predict future, depending as they do on their perfect knowledge, in the same way as the Tathâgata did before.

Examination of the Lokâyata Doctrines.

Examination of the external objects.

1. The Vijñânavâdins think that there is no external object except the Vijñâna. There are different streams of Vijñânas in different bodies, but they are all momentary. The Vijñânavâdins differ from the followers of the Upaniṣads, inasmuch as that while the latter consider Âtman as one and eternal the Vijñânavâdins consider their Vijñâna as momentary. These two theories cannot be correct, because it is impossible to deny the existence of the objective world which is proved by perception as different from the Vijñâna. If they are bold enough to deny the objective world why should they not deny even the Vijñâna?

1. This examination has been fully translated in § 5.

2. There is indeed an objective world, which is felt by the Vijñâna, and the objects are nothing but the conglomerations of atoms. The objects being conglomeration of atoms, they are not perceived as many or as atoms. The objects or rather the conglomerations of atoms appear indeed as one and of considerable size, but this is nothing but a delusion. S'ubhagupta.

3. The atoms have two qualities: general and special. The general quality is always perceived in the objects, which are the conglomerations of atoms. So these atoms appear as one and of considerable size. The special quality of the atoms which are the constituents of the formed object is known only by the emancipated. Sumati.

4. Things may have two or many qualities, provided they are felt as such. There is no other authority to establish a thing than the knowledge of the thing itself. It is not an universal law that one thing should be endowed with one quality only.

Kumârila.

5. The Vijñâna, even without having the form of a thing, can certainly reflect a thing, as it is only the knowledge of a thing.

S'ubhagupta.

6. The Vijñâna, in which reflections of the objects appear, should require some other knowledge for its own reflection in it, just as the eyes, which are able to see the objects but not able to see themselves. We cannot however explain the origin of the power in the objects which is ingrained in their nature.

Kumârila.

7. The objective world can be proved by perception as well as by inference. In daily life we are always perceiving the objects, and we can infer their existence because we obtain the expected effects from them. S'ubhagupta.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

8. The objects that appear in the Vijñâna are different fro their knowledge, because they are knowable like the differe chains of Vijñâna. Uddyotakar

9. The external objects exist, because they are reflected in t Vijñâna just as you see your face in the glass. It is obvious th the rays of the eyes returned by the glass see the face behi If there be no face, how can this phenomenon be proved?

Refutation.

1. The objective world is not real except the Vijñâna. Owi to the different tendencies of the mind many Vijñânas are risi one after another with the forms of the different objects. So may have, for instance, the reflection of two moons, and to so the conch seems yellow. You cannot prove these Vijñânas to true by pointing out the second moon and the yellow conc These Vijñânas have no corresponding objects, but they are Vijñân all the same. We can therefore justify that even without extern objects Vijñâna is possible. Then why should you not go a ste further, and acknowledge that all Vijñânas are produced witho reference to an outward object?

2. With regard to the question as to whether the extern objects are crowds of atoms or a constructed whole, it may b pointed out that if the objects are nothing but the collections atoms, then why are they regarded as one and of considerabl size, though they are produced by a collection of atoms? It canno be wrong knowledge in the same way as the Vijñâna of soun as eternal is wrong. The momentariness of everything bein established, we can say that the Vijñâna of sound as eterna is wrong; when the objective world is not established, how ca you say that this Vijñâna of the atoms as one and of considerabl size is not wrong?

3. One object cannot have two qualities. If so the objec will also be considered as two. If the two qualities are no different from each other, then why do you postulate two qualities, or why do you say that the special quality of the atoms are perceived by the emancipated only?

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

4. The Vijñânas cannot establish the presence of qualities in the objects, because many Vijnânas are caused without the presence of any object. It is also an universal law that the objects should be known as different only by different qualities. In that case why should your general and particular qualities not differentiate the thing? The atomic theory also cannot be established, because you cannot answer whether the atoms are one or many. There is no other alternative for establishing the atomic theory. If the atom is one, how can it have six parts, four in four directions, with one, on the top and the other below. An atom possessing these six parts should be designated as a conglomeration of atoms. It is therefore reasonable to hold the atoms also as nothing else than a reflection of the Vijñâna. As the atoms do not exist, an object cannot be formed with the atoms as constituent parts.

5. The Vijñânas never reflect the external objects either with or without the forms of those objects, or with a different form. They themselves rise one after another without reference to any external object. The nature of Vijñâna is such.

6. The nature of Vijñâna is to shine itself without the help of any other knowledge. If it requires such help then there, will be no end to it. The example of the eye is out of place here, because the Vijnâna itself is shining while the eyes are the causes for shining.

7. By perception the existence of the objective world cannot be proved. The perception which, for instance, has no black form cannot reflect black things. If the perception has a black form and the outward object is also black, then there would be two black Vijñânas which is absurd. By inference also the existence of the objective world cannot be proved because the reasons advanced by you is not accepted by both parties.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

8. All Vijñânas are not different from the things appearing in the Vijñâna, because they themselves being knowables are not different from themselves.

9. The rays of the eyes returned by the glass never see the real face. If so, the rays should feel the face as a real face but they feel the contrary. The existence of the external world therefore cannot be proved.

XXIV. S'rutiparîkṣâ.

Examination of the Revealed Literature.

1. The doctrine of Vijñâna as formulated by the Buddhists cannot stand to reason, as it is completely against the teachings of the Vedas which are of the highest authority. The Vedas have unquestionable authority as they are not human creations. As the five kinds of proof fail to establish the author of the Vedas, by the sixth proof or the proof of absence is established the absence of any author for the Vedas. Further, the Vedas being eternal are neither produced nor destroyed.

2. The knowledge derived from the Vedas cannot be proved as invalid by inference, because the inference is much inferior in authority to the proof of the Revealed Literature which is tantamount to the proof of perception.

3. The sound also is eternal and omnipresent because, it is always known and everywhere known, like the sun, and is identified as one.

4. The sounds are not always heard, because they are known only by the movement of the wind in the ear. By the power of the mind the meaning of sounds such as dîrgha etc. are known.

5. The words should be eternal, because they always express their meanings. Had it been a product then with every speaker the connection of the words with their meanings should be known again.

6. In our opinion not only are the letters eternal but so also the words which are known as products, because they are still universally employed with the same meanings as our forefathers used to attribute to then.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

7. The Buddhists cannot establish the non-eternity of sound by their reasons, because we have already proved that if the sound were not eternal the sentences would have failed to express their meanings, because the sound does not exist until that moment when the expression of the meaning is obtained.

8. As the letters and words are eternal, so also the sentences should be accepted as eternal, as they also always express their meanings. Though some sentences are used to express the wishes of their author, such as the Guṇa or Vṛddhi of Pâṇini, the same is not the case with the Vedas, because they have no author and because it is beyond human power to witness the things described in them, such as the heaven, sacrifices, etc.

9. The study of the Vedas in the case of a disciple must be preceded by a study of them by the preceptor, but still it may be called study. Similarly with the Bhârata, with the difference that we remember its author as being Vyâsa while for the Vedas no author can be known.

Refutation.

1. The Vedas cannot be recognized as an authority. The knowledge derived from the Vedas is invalid, because the Vedas have no author whose excellent qualifications would make him say the truth. They having no author is no reason for proving the validity of their statements. If by reason of having no author or of indestructibity alone you want to establish the eternality of the Vedas, then the lotus of the sky must also be held as eternal.

2. The inference which is caused by the reason endowed with the threefold qualities and which is connected with the things that are to be proved by reason rather than by the sound, is certainly a superior authority to the Vedas, which are nothing but sounds. If you take these sounds as proved by perception, then why not take the words uttered by human beings also as proved by perception?

3. Sound cannot be accepted as omnipresent, because it is clear that sounds are produced in different places and in different times. But the sun which is decidedly one is to be seen everywhere by different persons. It is not so in the case of sounds. Again the Pratyabhijñâ (experience) is not also a valid proof like perception and as such cannot be taken to establish the eternity of sound. Experience is expressed as 'the same as that' and hence it cannot represent perception, which has been defined by us as free from reflection (Kalpanâpoḍham). It cannot be accepted as proof also as it considers the past and the present as one. So it is invalid knowledge.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

4. When the sound is heard, we do not specially feel any movement of the wind in the ears. Again, we do not know of any special forms of sound besides its Mahattva (greatness), dîrghatva (length), etc. If they belong to the moving wind and not to the sound, then in the knowledge of sound nothing should be reflected. It is not also possible to accept a thing as eternal which manifests itself with the help of other things. If the manifesting cause (Vyañjaka) does something to the eternal sound, then the latter's eternity can be easily questioned. If not, then how can they be called manifesting agents?

5. It is not necessary to hold the words as being eternal because they can always express the same meaning. We have already proved in the Sabdârthaparîkṣâ that there is no connection between the word and its meaning. But the words are caused for producing the Vijñânas, even though in reality there are no outward objects.

6. The words are certainly products, because their arrangement differs according to the will of the composer. If the letters, words and sentences were eternal on the ground of their being used always, then just like the Vedas no other works can be produced by humanity. It is likely that the oneness that is felt in the words is caused by similarity just as in the light.

7. The difficulty remains the same in the case of both the Buddhists and yourselves, in case the sound is taken to be eternal. If they were eternal, then why should they express their meanings only at times, and not always? The eternal things cannot wait for the production of an effect. So we have to accept the fact that words are not eternal, but are endowed with the power to produce the knowledge of things.

8. There being no connection between the objects and the sentences, it is not necessary to postulate the eternity of the sentences. Further, according to your theory there cannot be any sentences, as they merely are combination of words. If the sentences were merely combinations of words, then the letters so combined have no meanings to express. If the letters arranged one after another are to be considered as a sentence, then how can eternal letters have arrangement, being as they are for ever existent and omnipresent? But what we believe is that the Vedas are composed according to the ideas of their authors, in the same way as the words Guṇa and Vṛiddhi are used by Pâṇini and stories are told by the people. It is also impossible to know the connection of the words with the object, just as the heaven and sacrifices.

9. You cannot maintain that the Vedas are eternal and divine, because they contain many unpleasant things such as Kâma, Mithyâ, Kriyâ, Prâṇihiṁsâ etc. The same can be applied to the works of Sugata also by explaining the expressions about the authors mentioned in them as Smṛtikartâ just as the Kâṭhaka, etc. are taken by you. Again, in view of the fact that the theory of momentariness is established the Vedas cannot be considered as eternal. So the Vedas have no authority on points of Dharma, but to learn Dharma we should go to a person who is pure, and who possesses a clear knowledge of the universe, in order to obtain truth and emancipation.

XXV. Svataḥprâmâṇyaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Self-Evidence.

1. It should be admitted that all Vijñânas have the power to be correct in their reflections. Whenever there is knowledge it is self-evident, and there is no necessity for other proofs for ascertaining its correctness. If every knowledge requires other proofs for its correctness there will be no end to searching for such proofs. So the knowledge derived from the Vedas is correct and self-evident, no further proof being required.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

2. The Vijñânas after production do not require the help of other things to perform their function, just as a pot when read does no longer require the help of the potter, but carries out its proper function. The Vijñâna has the power to reveal itself. But the incorrect knowledge is to be known by other Vijñânas which detect incorrectness in the causes of the false Vijñâna of the previous moment. Though the incorrectness of a Vijñâna is known by other Vijñânas there is no anavasthâ (absence of finality) just as in the matter of validity, the second knowledge becomes valid when the incorrectness of the previous Vijñâna which is wrong is found out.

Refutation,

1. Certainly the Vijñânas have the power to represent themselves correctly and that power is produced whenever the Vijñâna is produced by its own cause. But as there are plenty of incorrect Vijñânas we are not certain as to the power inherent in the Vijñânas. So it is natural that we should expect some other proof to ascertain the power in that Vijñâna just as the power of poison is ascertained by seeing its after effects. The proof of that power is nothing but the purity of the cause of a particular Vijñâna. If you want to establish the validity of the Vedas and call it self-evident, then their invalidity also may be established without assigning any other reason. Therefore as the invalidity is known by our not obtaining the expected effect, the validity is also to be known by obtaining the desired result.

2. We both hold the Vijñânas to be momentary, and we agree also that they do not remain the same after production. Then how could you say that they do not require the help of others to discharge their functions after production? If you do not admit the momentariness of the Vijñânas, then as the Vijñânas themselves reveal their validity after production, how can you explain the doubts arising very often with reference to things already known as to whether they exist or not? If the Vijñânas reveal their validity doubts cannot exist. The example of a pot is out of place because it is momentary; had it not been so, it would also have required other's help to do its function. If the validity of the previous Vijñâna is to be determined by the next Vijñâna, then there will be no anavasthâ or the absence of finality, because in the second Vijñâna there is no doubt of the reality of the previous Vijñâna: that Vijñâna is connected with the thing itself. When a man has doubt as to the existence of a thing previously perceived, he walks to the place and ascertains the fact. Then he realises that his first Vijñâna is correct. So the validity of the first Vijñâna is only to be known when the result of the knowledge is obtained. Until that time we entertain doubts as to the existence of the object. The knowledge derived from the Vedas can have no validity, because the Vedas must also have been composed by some authors who might have been impure in mind. Again, the knowledge derived from the Vedas may be accepted as valid if there is adequate proof. But the Vijñânas of heaven, sacrifices, etc. cannot be proved. So the validity of the Vedas cannot be called self-evident.

XXVI. Sarvajñaparîkṣâ.

Examination of Omniscience.

1. It is beyond human power to be omniscient or to know everything by his own sense-organs. No one is even able to perceive the anus and hairs of his own body, how then can we believe that a man is able to perceive all things in all different places and times. Again, it is impossible to call the Buddha omniscient because his sayings do not contain anything that is to be found in the Vedas. If you prove your teacher to be omniscient why should Kapila be not regarded as omniscient also, and in that case why should there be disagreement between their teachings about the universe? So no one has the power to see things which cannot be seen, or to know the unknowable; but to know them we must rely on the words which are eternal. The omniscience that is attributed in the Vedas to Brahmâ, S'aṅkara etc. means nothing except that they are able to know their own souls without much difficulty.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

2. Sugata's omniscience cannot be proved by inference, fo he instructed on Dharma without knowing the Vedas—the onl embodiment of the Dharma. Instructions on Dharma are give for various reasons, one of them being to deceive others. Mor over, Sugata instructed only the low class people, who were no versed in the Vedas, and this shows further that his instructio are not reliable.

3. Even if the Buddha is held to be omniscient he is unab to instruct people when he enters into meditation after obtainin the tenth Bhûmi. Further, we are not prepared to believe i your story that whenever Buddha enters into meditation, a things surrounding him, such as the walls, etc. speak out his view because we follow reasons and not myths.

4. You have to answer whether the omniscient Buddha whos you want to establish possesses many Vijñânas of different things o one Vijñâna; if many, then at what time, and whether all at one or in succession. If the Vijñâna is one, then how can he have th knowledge of such contradictory things as purity, impurit etc. When he looks at all things at the time of meditation wha must be his proof? Is it perception or inference? If the proo is something else, then how can you say his Vijñâna is knowledge which has but two proofs. To know the Dharma, therefore, w should go to the words which are not uttered by human beings because human beings cannot be omniscient.

Refutation.

1. It is vulgar to bring in objections such as that there i no one who can see the anus and hairs of his own body, while yo are not able to refute the arguments by which we establish tha there may a person who by his clear knowledge can se everything. Further, the omniscient cannot be seen by you unless you become omniscient also. You cannot deny a thing simply because you are not able to know it. But, on the contrary, you also should acknowledge an omniscient being who would see such things as heaven, sacrifices etc. and recite your Vedas. The Vedas cannot be eternal as they reveal meanings one after another in succession and not at one time. Sugata can be said to be omniscient as he did not say anything that is contained in the Vedas which are nothing but the repositories of impossible and absurd statements. Kapila, Vardhamâna, etc. cannot be called omniscient in the same sense as Sugata because we have proved their doctrines to be false in previous examinations. Sugata must be called omniscient, as he first formulated the doctrine of the voidness of the universe which we have proved to be correct.

CC-0. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

2. The Sugata, who actuated by his spontaneons sense of compassion instruct us on the voidness of the universe and whose burden of the song always is—

Parîkṣya bhikṣavo grâhyaṃ madvaco na tu gauŕavât.

"Oh Bhikṣus you should accept my words always after careful examination but not out of regard for me"—how can he have the intention of deceiving others? It is easy to say however that your Manu, etc. who wanted their Vedas and Purâṇas always to be honoured by others and who forced their ideas on others, tried only to cheat them. Further, what do you mean by low class people when we have persistently refuted the Jâti or class? On the contrary what are your Saṃskâras, etc.? They are nothing but clear foolishness. More instructions to the S'ûdras on the part of the Sugata shows that he had more compassion for those who were completely ignorant. He never cared for the castes, he simply wanted to help others.

3. We do not say that the tenth Bhûmi is adiffer ent region, but we hold that one remains in the condition of a Bodhisattva up to the tenth Bhûmi. Beyond it is the Bhûmi of a Buddha. So Bhagavân can speak even after reaching the stage of a Buddha, owing to his unbounded compassion for the suffering humanity. We still maintain that whenever Buddha enters into meditations all the surroundings speak out his views. It is quite likely because these surroundings develop great powers when they come in contact with the Buddha. Whatever the Buddha thinks during his meditations is tranmitted to the surroundings, and they are then able to give instruction on the voidness of everything out of their compassion for the human beings. Why then should you not accept these words, even though they emerge from inanimate objects?

4. Certainly the omniscient looks at all things by one Vijñâna and at one and the same time. It is quite possible to perceive even contrary things in one knowledge, either in the Sâkâravijñânavâda or in the Nirâkâravijñânavâda. Though he gets the knowledge of all things one after another even within a few moments he knows everything. Whenever S'ûnya is realized it becomes easy for one to become omniscient, because he is at once free from such sufferings as attachment, hatred, etc. which are mainly caused by pride in self. Being imbued with compassion on all beings and desirous of helping them to realize S'ûnya, he comprehends always the true nature of all things and knows all things at once. The omniscient is the best authority on Dharma, and hence it is fruitless to discuss whether his knowledge is either formless or endowed with a form.

We cannot close up this essay without recording our cordial thanks to Mr. Newton M. Dutt, Curator of Libraries for his valuable help in revising the MS of the Foreword and reading the proofs of same.

We desire also to record here our appreciation of the valuable and ungrudging services rendered to us by our esteemed assistant Pandit K. S. Ramaswamy S'astry S'iromani, the S'rauta Pandit in the Central Library Baroda. His extensive knowledge of the Philosophical Literature of India, and especially, his thorough acquaintance with the Mîmâmsâ literature have proved to be of great helpfulness in preparing this essay. In rendering such invaluable service he was actuated by his devotion to both S'ântarakṣita and Kamalas'ila for whom he has learned to cherish a genuine love. But for him it would have been impossible for us to give a detailed summary of contents (§9) in the Foreword, or complete the whole work within the limited time at our disposal. Looking to the difficult nature of the book the summary seems to be of assistnace by enabling the less advanced readers better to enter into the subject matter. Pandit Ramaswamy has also very kindly undertaken the preparation of an English translation of the Kârikâs of the Tattvasaṅgraha, and this useful work we hope to present to the public at no very distant date.

Lastly, we have to thank the authorities of the Nirnaya Sagar Press, which has justly earned a world-wide reputation in the printing of Sanskrit works, for the interest they have taken during the last six years in passing the Tattvasaṅgraha, through the press and the care they have exercised in correcting and revising the proofs.
